On its American side we should naturally expect to find this English 'Dictionary' rather weak. Relative unimportance from the point of view cannot, nevertheless, excuse antiquated knowledge, much less inexactness. It is somewhat surprising that the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States figures in these pages only incidentally and obscurely in the article, "United States of America, Religion in." In fact, the American Presbyterian Church is accorded more attention—and it would have borne still more, inasmuch as its statistics, as given, are not only belated, but inaccurate. To say that Harvard is "distinctly Unitarian" (p. 547) is to confuse past and present. Under "Missions" we find perhaps the most remarkable of all the deficiencies, as related to the cis-Atlantic reader, in the absence of any allusion to the missionary activities of the American churches. The same title reminds us that no explanation is given of the term "mission," recently imported from Roman Catholic into Anglican usage.

American Society for Psychical Research.

The Research work of the Society is at present divided between five Committees:

1. The Committee on Thought-Transference is engaged in ascertaining whether a vivid impression or a distinct idea in one mind can be communicated to another without the intervening help of the recognized organs of sensation.

2. The Committee on Apparitions and Haunted Houses wishes to collect accounts, from trustworthy sources, of apparitions of absent or deceased persons, of premonitions, whether these occur in dreams or in the waking state, of disturbances in houses described as "haunted," and of any cognate phenomena.

3. The Committee on Hypnotism is engaged in the study of the mesmeric or hypnotic trance, with the object of ascertaining its causes and of elucidating its psychical and physiological accompaniments.

4. The Committee on Mediumistic Phenomena is chiefly concerned with the experimental investigation of the phenomena commonly described as "Spiritualistic," and is particularly desirous of obtaining opportunities for investigation with private and unpaid "mediums," or other persons in whose presence "mediumistic" phenomena occur.

5. The Committee on Experimental Psychology is making investigations in folk-thought or the study of sociology in its psychological aspects. It seeks to ascertain the psychical characteristics common to many individuals may possess in common in virtue of their being members of particular races or communities.

Communications are earnestly requested from all persons interested in any branch of the work of the Society.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JUNE 9, 1887.

The Week.

SHORTLY after the adjournment of Congress in March, Senator Sherman went to Nashville and made his bid for the Presidency from a Southern platform. He began by ostentatiously folding up the bloody shirt. "Your people," he said, "divided on opposite lines and bore more than your share of the terrible losses and sacrifices of the war. It is over, thank God! but the courage, bravery, and fortitude of both sides are now the pride and heritage of us all." Growing more emphatic as he proceeded, he said: "Think not that I come here to reproach any man for the part he took in that fight, or to revive in the heart of any one the triumph of victory or the pangs of defeat. I did not come to make apologies—nor do I ask any of you. The war was perhaps unavoidable — bound to come some time, and the sooner ended the better." On Wednesday week Senator Sherman was in Springfield, Ill., and there made his bid for the Presidency from a Northern platform. Unless the testimony were overwhelming that the same man made the two speeches, it would be impossible to resist the conviction that there was a case of mistaken identity. Certainly the transformation of Dr. Jekyll into Mr. Hyde was not more remarkable than the change which makes the Nashville apostle of conciliation in March preach the gospel of hate at Springfield in June. "Think not that I come here to reproach any man for the part he took in that fight," said Dr. Jekyll. On the other hand, Mr. Hyde pours forth a long string of reproaches against every man who took part in that fight, and who has since been appointed to office by a Democratic Administration. Dr. Jekyll maintained that the "rebel" of twenty-five years ago should now stand on an equality with the "loyal" man of the same era, and he had no apologies to ask of any man who sought to overthrow the Government. Mr. Hyde condemns all rebels as unfit to hold office under the Federal Government, and declares that "every nation to which these gentlemen [ministers, consuls, etc.] are accredited, may fairly conclude that it was the rebel cause that triumphed and not the Union cause."

Aside from his waving of the bloody shirt, Senator Sherman devoted his speech to the advocacy of paternalism in government. He wants Congress to embark upon the most extravagant schemes of internal improvements; he insists that the Federal Government shall appropriate large sums of money towards the support of schools in the various States. "According to the Confederate idea," he says, "measures like the Blair bill were unconstitutional," and the Confederate idea is the Democratic idea; while, according to the Union idea, they are constitutional, and the Union idea is the Republican idea. Senator Sherman appears to be entirely oblivious of the fact that what he calls "the Confederate idea" is the idea which has been laid down as correct by a Supreme Court all of whose members but one were Republicans. From the decision in the Louisiana slaughter-house cases in 1872 down to the annulling of the Civil-Rights Act in 1883, the whole drift of the highest tribunal has been against what Senator Sherman calls the Union idea that Congress can do anything it pleases. The Supreme Court has declared that the theory upon which such legislation as the Blair bill is based would "make Congress take the place of the State Legislatures and supersede them," and that it is "absurd" to affirm such a theory.

The testimony taken at Boston in the Pacific railroad investigation shows that the Kansas Pacific and Union Pacific consolidation was brought about by the virtual threat of Jay Gould to join the Missouri Pacific and the Kansas Pacific together and extend the line to Ogden, or otherwise invade the Union Pacific's territory. It does not appear that the directors of the Union Pacific, other than Gould himself, got any of the profits of the consolidation. Gould himself resigned as a director just before the consolidation was voted. It was a very cunning device, and has, perhaps, never been surpassed in the annals of railroad witchcraft. The Union Pacific had fought the Kansas Pacific to the point of bankruptcy, and was in a position to have swallowed it on its own terms, when, presto, the Kansas Pacific, in the person of Gould, turned and swallowed the Union Pacific. The Investigating Commission have now got all the facts that were not accessible to them before. The great K. P. mystery is cleared up. If there is any remedy for the wrong done in 1879, we confess that we do not see how it is to be reached, unless possibly by impeaching Gould's resignation as a director of the Union Pacific, and seeking to hold him as a trustee acting in the double capacity of buyer and seller of the Kansas Pacific stock.

Some faint endeavors have been made to discredit Secretary Bayard on account of the release of the two British sealing vessels seized last year in Behring Sea. The theory of Mr. Bayard's critics is, that inasmuch as the Czar of Russia in 1821 proclaimed the waters lying north of the Aleutian Islands as far as the Arctic Ocean a closed sea, and since Russia afterwards conveyed to us her own rights in said waters, therefore no other Power has any fishing rights there. It is in evidence, however, that when the ukase of 1821 was issued, Mr. John Quincy Adams, American Secretary of State, lodged an objection to the Russian claim in St. Petersburg, and that the Russian Ambassador at Washington in due time made a reply that, while Russia might claim the right of sovereignty there, the exercise of it would not be insisted on, or words to that effect. It is acknowledged, also, that spaces of open water as wide as from New York to Bermuda exist between these islands and between the islands and the main land. The question then is, whether the United States can claim or ought to claim exclusive rights in a sea where they denied, or declined to recognize, the exclusive rights of Russia. Is it not pushing the headland doctrine pretty far when it reaches over a space of nine hundred miles of salt water? Undoubtedly cases can be found in the books where exclusive rights of fishing have been claimed in waters not enclosed by land at all, and such rights may have been recognized by maritime Powers for longer or shorter periods. Portugal claimed at one time the exclusive right to circumnavigate the Cape of Good Hope, by virtue of the discovery of that route to India by Vasco da Gama, and her claim was for a time recognized. But such claims gradually disappear and give way to the common rights of mankind in all that part of the ocean beyond a marine league of the shore, and not embraced within clearly marked and definitely limited headlands. There was a time when Spain owned all the lands bordering on the Caribbean Sea and all the islands which fringe it on the east; yet it is not conceivable that the commercial world would, under any circumstances, acknowledge the exclusive right of Spain to sail into the Caribbean Sea, and still less her right to confer the privilege of sailing there on some countries to the exclusion of others. Nor would the strongest naval Power in the world, if thus situated, at this day think of setting up the claim.

The case against Mr. Bayard is sought to be propped up by saying that, unless other fishermen are kept out of Behring Sea, the fur seal will be exterminated. This is a view which the Alaska Commercial Company would be likely to push forward prominently, since they have a monopoly of seal-fishing in those waters so far as our people are concerned. If it is true that the extermination of these useful animals is threatened, that is a reason for coming to a good understanding with other governments for the protection of the fishery. If our rights in Behring Sea are not exclusive, we cannot control the acts of any but our own fishermen. The fur seal does not bear our brand until he comes upon our land. Once it is admitted or established that British or Japanese sailors can go there, the argument that the seal will be exterminated unless we keep the British and Japanese out, becomes impertinent. It is certainly to be hoped that the seal fishery may be controlled and regulated on better principles than buffalo hunting has been in our own exclusive domain. This noble and useful beast has been all but destroyed within the short space of fifteen years, under our very eyes, and within our undisputed jurisdiction. The wild pigeon is nearly exterminated. Whales at one time became scarce, and so perhaps may the fur seal become if private cupidity is left to deal with him unrestrained by scientific regulation backed by sufficient force. The time seems to be propitious for a convention which shall settle the principles of the seal fishery in such manner as may preserve the animals from unscientific destruction, and at the same time preserve peace and concord among the nations

The dark ways of the heathen Chinee have become proverbial, and it will take a good while yet to complete the inventory of them. An addition to it of some importance has just been made through the capture of a letter of instructions to Chinese seeking to evade the operation of our legislation at the port of San Francisco. We refer to the case of Lum Cheong, accused of impersonating another Chinaman under the Restriction Act, who presented to the customs officials a return certificate made out in the name of Ng Ah Qua, and attempted to prove to them that he was the person to whom the certificate was issued. The testimony showed that Cheong purchased the certificate of Quong Yeum & Co. of Hong-Kong for $10, and that a regular business of selling certificates was carried on by the firm. The letter of instructions above mentioned is designed for use in cases like Lum Cheong's. It is a circular intended to be studied by Chinese immigrants during their voyage from Hong-Kong to San Francisco, and gives names of the streets running through "Chinatown," addresses of leading Chinese merchants, a description of the cable-cars and other conspicuous local objects, such as would be familiar to any person who had ever lived in San Francisco, but must be utterly unknown to newly-arriving immigrants, excepting for artful instruction beforehand. The circular, says the San Francisco News-Letter, "is brief, concise, and would not make more than one evening's task for an average schoolboy," but it is so ingeniously compiled as to cover all the questions which would naturally be asked concerning local knowledge, and the fresh immigrant, thus expertly "primed," has been able, by his answers, to show quite beyond doubt that he was a former resident who had been abroad and was rightfully returning to his real home. The News-Letter says that the only explanation of the prescience by which the Six Companies are able to instruct their people in advance as to the questions the correct answers to which would satisfy the courts and procure their release under writs of habeas corpus, "is one that may well make the goddess of Justice bow her head in very shame"; but we should doubt that this presumption is required in the case of the quick-witted Chinese. They might be trusted rightly to invent the whole scheme.

The testimony of the silver manufacturers on Friday, showing the causes which had led them to the decision to employ no Knights of Labor in future, was very interesting. The chief cause was the threat, repeatedly made by a Walking Delegate or Committeeman, that unless certain demands from their workmen were granted, the whole force would strike. Tiffany & Co. had suffered especially from this kind of interference. In one instance the Committeeman had told them that unless certain demands were granted, a strike would be ordered within half an hour. They refused to listen to him, and within half an hour a signal was given, the engine was stopped, and the men went out. On another occasion, another Committeeman, Dunn, had called upon them, said his name was George, and informed them that the Knights had found out the weakness of the silvermiths; twenty men were able to demoralize the whole business of any one company, and would do it unless their demands were granted. This man Dunn subsequently took the stand and declared his trade to be that of an engineer, but he did not work at it now. He had never been a silversmith. His sole occupation at present was member of the Board of Arbitration of District Assembly 49.

It seems incredible that so intelligent a body of men as silversmiths, from the nature of their work, must be, could be led into such folly as is here disclosed. According to the testimony of all the manufacturers, their men were industrious, well-paid, and apparently contented until the Knights got hold of them. Yet they gave themselves over to the control of men like Dunn, who did not belong to their trade and knew nothing of its conditions. Dunn, according to his own testimony, looked upon his position as a member of the Arbitration Board mainly as an opportunity to levy blackmail on the manufacturers. He had not studied to see what the grievances of the workmen were, but just what number of men would be sufficient to demoralize the business of a manufacturer. Having found out this, he went to the manufacturer and threatened him with a strike of that number if he did not run his business as the Knights ordered. He also confessed that he lied about being a Knight, and had advised others to do so if necessary in order to get work. He is himself apparently living on the profits of his position as an arbitrator, and, like Quinn, the hackman, who was managing the 'longshoremen's strike, is just the kind of a man with whom a self-respecting, industrious workingman would have no sympathy. Yet the silversmiths allow him to throw them out of employment without cause or justification. Dunn remarked complacently on Friday that the laws were defective, and he would like to see a great many changes in them. The kind of labor law most needed now is one protecting honest laboring men from such worthless creatures as the Dunns and Quinns.

The attempt, under the personal authority of General Master Workman Powderly himself, to use the boycott, not to crush a hated capitalistic employer, but to enable one District Assembly of Knights to wreak its vengeance upon another, is the natural outcome of this kind of power. The boycott, as used by the Knights, is nothing more nor less than a weapon for extorting blackmail. Heretofore it has been used by the blackguards and loafers who control Assembly 49, mainly against employers, but now they have attempted to put it in force against a rival assembly, No. 126. This assembly contains nearly all the carpet-weavers in the vicinity of New York. They are industrious men, who earn good wages, and whose sole offence as Knights is, that they refuse to obey the orders which are issued by Assembly 49 to strike in support of various kinds of boycotts. A while ago they struck in support of the coal-handlers' strike, and lost by that operation $27,000 in wages. After that experience, they decided that they did not wish a shoemaker, or a cigar-maker, or an engineer to tell them to strike because some carpenters or coal-heavers in New Jersey or Brooklyn were on strike, and they refused to join No. 49 in any more boycotts. So No. 49 appealed to Powderly, and Powderly has issued an official order boycotting the carpets of Higgins & Co., in whose factory nearly all the carpet-weavers of 126 are employed. As Powderly is on record as orally opposed to boycotting, he does not use the word boycott in his order, but directs the Knights to tell Higgins & Co. that their carpets are not such as the Knights "can recommend," and requests them to send "special committees" to call upon firms handling these carpets, "notify them of the estimation in which these goods are held, and, if deemed expedient, inform them that you will prefer to bestow your patronage with firms that do not handle such goods." This illegal and foolish document will probably put an end to Powderly's right to be considered a sort of social-science reformer of Labor, for it sets him forth in a very clear light as a tricky demagogue.

The announcement is made that the Prison Labor Reform Commission of this State, having failed to secure the approval of "Labor" for the State-account system, are now in favor of putting the convicts at work on jute bags, since most of these articles come from foreign countries, and they are produced here by "only the lowest-paid free labor in the State." There is one objection which will probably confront the Commissioners before the jute-bag plan has gone into force. It may be all very well to throw the entire competition of prison-labor upon the lowest-paid free labor in the State, i. e., upon those least able to stand up against it, but it will soon be discovered that jute bags compete with cooperage to an enormous and increasing extent. It was only a year ago that the manufacturers of barrel staves petitioned Congress to put a differential duty on sugar imported in jute bags, in order to compel the West Indian planters to use hogsheads. It is a solemn fact, too, that a large part of the flour put up at Minneapolis for export to foreign countries is sent in jute bags. Now, is it not plain that if jute bags are made as cheaply as prison labor can produce them, a still greater number of barrels and hogsheads will be thrown out of use? The coopers are far from being the lowest-paid laborers in the State. Therefore they are not to be put upon with impunity. It might be arranged that the convicts should make bags by hand exclusively, so as not to compete with the machine-made goods produced outside, but, after all, the prison bags must be sold in competition with all other bags, even if the State loses money on them. Obviously the only true solution of the prison-labor problem from the labor point of view is to provide ample playgrounds for the convicts, and instructors in athletic games and healthful amusements. Absolute idleness among the prisoners is not thought of by anybody, since it leads to obesity and insanity. The only thing objected to is their earning their own living. The sooner we acknowledge this by an act of the Legislature, and by corresponding appropriations of money for outdoor exercise for the convicts, the sooner shall we be delivered from a most pestilent form of folly. There are more adult males landed at Castle Garden in a single week to compete with "Labor" than all the inmates of prisons and reformatories in New York in a whole year.

The hostility of the professional politicians in the Democratic party to civil-service reform was shown a few weeks ago, when nearly all the New York Democratic Assemblymen voted to repeal the Civil-Service Law, and the hostility of the same class in the Republican party is shown by the action of the Massachusetts House last week. For two years a scheme has been pushed to exempt all Union soldiers from the necessity of passing competitive examinations, and it passed the Legislature last year, only to be vetoed by the Governor. The measure is ostensibly urged as "the payment of a debt of gratitude to the veterans," but the more honest of its advocates have openly admitted that they were pushing it as a means of breaking down the whole reform system in the State. The Boston Journal properly characterized it last year as "an assault upon the State civil-service system, which is every bit as deadly as that which the Democrats in Congress are making upon the national system." Yet this raid of the spoilsmen was endorsed by the House on Thursday by the overwhelming majority of 158 yeas to 37 nays, and the bill appears likely to become a law.

A civil-service-reform bill has been introduced in the Rhode Island Legislature by the Lieutenant-Governor, Col. Honey, and we trust it will be made a law. It is modelled upon the Massachusetts law, but goes a step further than that in dealing with the tenure of office, and, if enacted, will not take effect till the terms of all the present State, legislative, and other officials have expired. After that, the tenure of office of all officials, except a few who are not included in the requirements of the law, is made to continue till "they shall die, resign, or be removed for just cause by the appointing or electing power, which cause shall always be fully expressed in the order or resolution of removal."

What on earth did Mr. Stickney, Jacob Sharp's counsel, mean by saying on Monday in court during the "jury-fixing" proceedings: "We (Sharp's counsel) have made many earnest efforts to induce the friends of Mr. Sharp to remain neutral in this matter, and I supposed we had succeeded"? Is it possible that "the friends of Mr. Sharp" let it be known to his lawyers that they meant to take sides in "this matter," and endeavor to secure Sharp's escape by illicit means? Is it possible that, having heard of these attempts, the counsel treated them simply as expressions of injudicious friendly zeal, and argued against them as such, instead of denouncing them as crimes, and threatening to hand the perpetrators over to the police? Moreover, is "neutrality" not a new and startling term for a member of the bar to apply to abstinence from that form of criminal interference with the course of justice known as "embracery"?

The phenomena attending the O'Brien demonstration in Union Square on Saturday evening seemed at first very curious and, indeed, almost unaccountable. There was a general disposition to regard it as one of those striking mischances that have so often made the Irish cause ridiculous in the eyes of its well wishers. But the completed narrative takes it out of the class of providential occurrences, and enables us to interpret it as a very common piece of political chicane. Mr. O'Brien crossed the ocean in order to worry Lord Lansdowne. He had succeeded in making a great deal of disturbance in Canada, had raised mobs and been pelted by them. Making a disturbance for its own sake is a very large part of the Home-Rule plan of campaign. It is perfectly logical, too, since long experience has proved that British public opinion can only be moved to serious thought upon Ireland by external impressions. John Bull considers Irish questions a tremendous bore, but he likes his ease so much that he will take this nuisance into Parliament, and debate it, and divide on it, and do something about it if his life is made sufficiently miserable on account of it. Mr. O'Brien's mission to Canada was of a piece with the obstruction tactics of Parnell. It was planned to break John Bull's rest, to prevent him from having any peace of his life, to compel him to keep thinking about the Irish question, and debating it in Parliament, and dividing on it, and doing something about it. Hence, although Mr. O'Brien's mission had the appearance of an impertinent errand, it was a logical part of an extensive plan to keep the British Empire in hot water until Ireland gets home rule.

Mr. O'Brien was eminently successful in Canada. He went from one stage to another in the prime object of making a disturbance, until he was shot at. This last occurrence heightened his otherwise captivating qualities (for he is certainly a very able man), and fitted him to "draw well" in New York. Any party that could "capture" him would make a great deal of political capital. It did not occur either to Tammany Hall, or the County Democracy, or the Republican Machine to get up a demonstration for Mr. O'Brien, and here we think they were all caught napping. The George-McGlynn or McGlynn-George party were much more wide awake, and they saw their opportunity. An invitation was offered to Mr. O'Brien, and he accepted it, supposing that its object was to promote the cause with which he is identified, and no other. Common prudence suggested to him to inquire what resolutions it was proposed to adopt; that is, what character was to be given to the meeting. When he found that it was to be a meeting to endorse the Henry George theory of land confiscation, he declined to lend himself to any such purpose, for the reason that it was no part of the Irish Home-Rule policy, but directly opposed to the same, and because his participation in such a meeting would destroy his influence at home, as it had destroyed or largely neutralized that of another Irish leader who had incautiously committed himself to it. In short, Mr. O'Brien considered the Henry George land doctrine a humbug or worse; he knew that the Irish National League detested it, and that any countenance given to it by him would react severely against the cause he had at heart, both in Ireland and in England. So the O'Brien demonstration came off without O'Brien. It was great in numbers, but empty in everything else. There were some small side shows that helped to rob the demonstration of dignity. An attempt was made to drag in Dr. McGlynn's controversy with the Pope, and also to connect the affair with the Phœnix Park murders. The main thing, however, was the plan to annex O'Brien and the Irish National League to the party that nominated Henry George for Mayor last fall. The other incidents resulted from having too many cooks for the occasion.

We find in the London Spectator for May 28 an article on "The Irish and British Vote in the United States," in which occurs the following deeply interesting passage:

> "It seems, however, as if the extraordinary power and importance to which the Irish vote has risen in the States would bring its own cure. As long as the Irish vote passively demoralized American politics, it was difficult to form a distinct opposition to its influence. Men had other reasons for choosing their party connections, and could not well make a political creed of opposition to anything so indeterminate in its demands as the Irish party. Now, however, there are signs that such an opposition is forming. The Irish vote has begun to be exercised with a direct object—hatred of England, and the desire to injure her by embroiling her with the United States. This is something definite, and can be fought with. Fortunately, there is plenty of material out of which to form the opposition. Though it may sound at first extraordinary to our readers, it is none the less true that the number of Englishmen, Scotchmen, and Welshmen at this moment in the States is largely in excess of that of the Irish. A correspondent of the Chicago Times, quoted in the St. James's Gazette of Tuesday last, calculates the number of born British and Canadians in the States at the present moment at 2,090,000, the born Irish at 1,850,000. This gives a majority of 240,000 persons to the British and Canadians."

There is something very perplexing about those figures. According to the census of 1880, the Irish-born at that moment in the United States numbered 1,854,571, while all the born British and Canadians, including not merely those born in Canada but in the whole of British America, numbered only 1,632,871. How the statistician whom the Spectator quotes with such oracular complacency has been able to raise this total to 2,090,000 we are unable to comprehend. He may have done it by adding all the newly arrived British and Canadian immigrants since 1880; but if he got it in that way, he ought also to have added to the Irish total its quota of arrivals since 1880. Between 1880 and the close of 1886 there were, in round numbers, over 470,000 Irish immigrants landed here, bringing the total Irish-born population up to 2,325,000. Instead, therefore, of there being a "majority of 240,000 for the British and Canadians," they are, at the lowest estimate, in a minority of about 235,000. We regret to say that the "signs" which the Spectator has discovered of the "forming" of this British opposition to the Irish vote are not visible in this country, however apparent they may be in London. In fact, the discovery appears to be one of those hallucinations, now so common, hatched by the Irish question in the brains of British politicians.

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S NEWS.

[WEDNESDAY, June 1, to TUESDAY, June 7, 1887, inclusive.]

DOMESTIC.

SENATOR SHERMAN, by the invitation of the Republican members of the Legislature of Illinois, made a speech at Springfield June 1 on national politics. He called the doctrines and the tendency of the Democratic party "Confederate," expressed approval of the schemes to give national aid to education, and to connect at the Government's expense the waters of the Mississippi and of the lakes.

An act to prohibit book-making on races and pool-selling, except within the enclosure of incorporated fair or race-track associations, has become a law in Illinois. It provides a penalty of imprisonment for a period of not less than six months nor more than one year, or a fine not exceeding $2,000, for selling pools or keeping records of bets or wagers upon results of any trial or contest of the speed, power, or endurance of any man or beast, or upon the result of any political appointment, election, or nomination.

Gov. Sawyer of New Hampshire took the oath of office June 2. In his inaugural address he called the recent withdrawal of fifty fire-insurance companies from business in the State "an attempt at coercion," and "in effect a strike and a boycott." He recommended legislation providing for a ten-hour law and weekly payments, and for arbitration of labor troubles, and expressed himself favorable to prohibition and free text-books for the public schools.

A bill providing for a constitutional amendment to forbid the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors as a beverage was passed by the Massachusetts Senate June 1 to be engrossed, by a vote of 15 to 10. It has not yet been passed by the House.

A Prohibition Convention to make nominations for the New York State election in the fall has been called at Syracuse August 25 and 26.

One of the counsel of the New York Hotel-Keepers' Association on Sunday, June 5, in company with a police captain, drank liquor at several of the principal hotels, to prepare test cases so that a judgment may be got from a court as to the constitutionality of the Excise Law, by the enforcement of which under Mayor Hewitt's administration Sunday has become so "dry" a day in New York.

Gov. Hill of this State has signed the bill prohibiting the employment of street-car and elevated-railroad employees in New York and Brooklyn for more than ten hours in every consecutive twelve.

Preparations were made by the Labor party in this city for a great demonstration on Saturday evening, June 4, in honor of William O'Brien, the Irish editor who was here, returned from his trip to Canada. But he refused to attend the meeting because John McMackin, who had recently presided at a lecture delivered by P. J. Tynan, the alleged "Number One" of the conspiracy to kill Cavendish and Burke in Phœnix Park, presided over it. He objected also to one of the proposed resolutions, which sought to identify the Irish land movement with the Henry George agitation for the abolition of private ownership in land. The Central Labor Union the next day passed resolutions condemning his action. At a large meeting of the "Anti-Poverty Society" in the Academy of Music, McMackin made a speech attacking O'Brien, and so did Dr. McGlynn, who declared that "Mr. O'Brien is a landlord at heart," and that "between him and Lord Lansdowne there is a difference of only 20 or 25 per cent." On the other hand, O'Brien has received approving despatches from many Irish organizations, and cheers for him were given at an Irish meeting in this city which was largely made up of members of the Tammany organization. The political effect of this alienation of some of the Irish from the Labor party may make the incident of far-reaching importance.

Six Circuit judges were elected in Chicago June 6. Grinnell and Clifford, candidates of a citizens' organization, were opposed by Kraus and English, who were the candidates of the United Labor party, which recently made a red flag campaign against Roche for Mayor. The Labor candidates received less than half as many votes as the others.

The Board of Health at Key West, Fla., has declared the yellow fever epidemic there. At noon June 7, eighteen cases and six deaths had been officially reported. The National Marine Hospital Service has $80,000 in its yellow-fever fund, but its expenditure is so hedged about by restrictions that the fund cannot be used until the Treasury Department is satisfied that the State authorities cannot control the disease. The Government will use part of it to send trained nurses to Key West.

In the trial of a Chinaman in San Francisco on June 3 for impersonating another Chinaman, and thereby evading the Restriction Act, testimony was given which showed that a regular business of selling return certificates for $10 each, to gain admission into the United States, is done by a firm in Hong Kong.

The State Department has officially been informed that Russia has raised the import duty on iron and steel, and on articles manufactured in whole or in part from those metals, from 25 to 30 per cent.

The United Presbyterian Assembly, in session in Philadelphia, after a long discussion on June 1, voted, 107 to 54, in favor of the use of organs in the churches.

Bishop Potter has revived the project, with promise of success, to erect a great Protestant cathedral in this city, which shall give to "all men, of whatever condition or fellowship, the ministrations of religion in a language understood by the common people, bidding to its pulpits the ablest and most honored teachers, free for meditation, devotion, or rest at all hours, without fee or restriction," and thus be "a witness to the brotherhood of humanity in the bond of the Divine Nazarene, and of the need of the human heart for some worthy place and voice for the expression of its deepest needs." A subscription has been opened to a fund to erect it, and several large sums have already been subscribed.

A monument to actors was dedicated in the Evergreen Cemetery June 6, in the presence of many eminent members of the theatrical profession. The choruses of different opera companies sang a hymn, the words of which were composed by George Edgar Montgomery; Edwin Booth spoke briefly, and William Winter read a poem written for the occasion.

An earthquake was felt over the greater part of northern California and western Nevada on June 3, which shook the plaster from walls and made fissures in the earth. A slighter shock was felt about the same time in South Carolina. On June 6 a shock was felt near Quebec.

By the explosion of three kegs of powder at the Cambria Iron Company's quarries at Birmingham, Pa., a fall of the rock was caused whereby eight men were killed and another was fatally hurt, on June 4.

A Texas and Pacific east-bound train was stopped by four masked men at Benbrook, ten miles west of Fort Worth, on June 4, and the express and mail cars were robbed.

A steam tricycle has been exhibited at an athletic club in Philadelphia. It carries enough water and oil to run three hours, it has been run fifteen miles an hour, and it weighs 175 pounds, or seventy-five pounds more than a similar tricycle without a steam-engine.

The transatlantic steamship, the Umbria, which arrived here June 4, came from Queenstown to Sandy Hook in six days, four hours, and twelve minutes. The time of the Etruria, which had made the best time ever made before this trip of the Umbria, on the westward passage, was six days, five hours, and thirty-six minutes, and her best eastward passage was six days, five hours, and eighteen minutes—more than an hour longer than the Umbria's voyage required.

News has been received at Manson, Ia., that the Rev. Dr. Reid, who left that place last winter to become a missionary in Central Africa, has been eaten by cannibals.

William A. Wheeler, ex-Vice-President of the United States, died at his home at Malone, N. Y., on June 4, after a period of feebleness, in his sixty-eighth year. Mr. Hamlin is now the only survivor of those who have held the Vice-Presidential office. Chief-Justice Mercur of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania died at Wallingford, June 6, from congestion of the lungs. Henry Meigs, once President of the Stock Exchange and for many years a well-known broker in this city, died June 7, in his seventy-ninth year.

FOREIGN.

An important movement in British politics was a conference at Birmingham on June 1 of the Radical Union, where the difference between the Unionists and the Gladstonians was discussed. Lord Hartington wrote that the action of the Gladstone Liberals had caused an indefinite postponement of the settlement of the Irish question. The alliance of the Gladstone Government with the Parnellites had daily weakened Parliamentary authority. Mr. Chamberlain regretted that Mr. Trevelyan had doffed his armor when the fight was the hottest. The Liberal-Unionists had been taunted with their alliance with the Tories. There was satisfaction, however, in knowing that their allies were English gentlemen, and not subsidized agents of a foreign conspiracy. The time seemed to be approaching when the formation of a new party would be found necessary. The conference was attended by 2,000 delegates, representing all parts of Great Britain. The tone of all the speeches was bitterly anti-Gladstonian. It was the first representative Unionist meeting where irreconcilable hostility to the Gladstonians was the rallying cry. It was resolved to appoint a new electoral committee for London, and a large amount of money was promised for expenses. At an evening mass meeting of Unionists in the Birmingham Town Hall, a letter was read from Mr. John Bright, which was a long and fierce denunciation of the Gladstonian policy. Mr. Gladstone has made an offer to the Unionists which amounts to this: Pass the Home-Rule Bill, and satisfy the Irish people; then make all the provisions desirable for maintaining the continuity of the Imperial Parliament. But they have rejected it, and the two factions of the Liberal party are further apart than ever.

Mr. Gladstone meanwhile has been making home-rule speeches in Wales, where he has aroused the greatest popular enthusiasm.

Lord Randolph Churchill made a speech at Wolverhampton June 3, wherein he sharply criticised the extravagant management and the inefficiency of the war and naval equipments of Great Britain. He advised the Unionists to make a solid stand, and show Gladstone that they were as determined as he is in the matter of the Irish question. He was gratified to believe in the power of the Government to smash obstruction at any moment they pleased, and when Parliament reassembled he thought that strong measures ought to be adopted to prevent the Crimes Bill from being amended till it became useless.

Mr. Parnell, about whose health much concern has been felt, was in the House of Commons June 7, looking much improved. He has gained flesh during the recess.

In the House of Commons, in committee on June 7, when a Parnellite member moved an amendment to the Crimes Bill, Mr. Parnell interposed, saying that, owing to the advanced stage of the session and the large number of important matters that had not yet been debated, he would suggest that his friends move only such amendments as they regarded as indispensable. Several amendments were thereafter withdrawn, several others were rejected, some of them by the use of the closure rule, and then Mr. Smith's motion that the third clause of the bill be adopted was carried—211 to 83.

The evictions of tenants at Bodyke, Ireland, were begun again June 2. The Sheriff was protected while doing his work by 600 policemen and troops. At one house, in which the inmates were barricaded, the officers made a hole through the wall with crowbars, and then removed the furniture. The tenants offered all the opposition in their power. In some of their houses cayenne pepper was burned, the fumes of which nearly choked the bailiffs. At others boiling water was thrown from the windows upon the evicting force. At two houses fights occurred between the police and the people, and a number of arrests were made. No other recent evictions have caused so much excitement. Michael Davitt addressed a meeting in the Bodyke district, and urged the people to offer the utmost resistance and to retake possession of their houses. He has begun an agitation to rebuild every house demolished, and he has suggested that a fund be opened to carry on the plan of campaign upon a more extended basis.

Mr. Davitt's advice to the tenants at Bodyke to resist eviction has not met the approval of the National League. At the regular fortnightly meeting, at Dublin June 7, the opinion was freely expressed that this advice was not wise.

When Queen Kapiolani of the Hawaiian Islands arrived at Liverpool, June 2, the Mayor and a guard of honor met the royal party at the wharf.

Windows on the route that the Queen will take from Buckingham Palace to Westminster Abbey on June 21 are letting for £30, and single first-floor rooms for £50.

The President of the Cambridge (England) University Boat Club has made a public appeal to the students to subscribe to a fund to pay the expenses of sending a crew to America to row against the Harvard University crew

Prof. Thomas Spencer Baynes, the well-known English teacher of Logic and one of the editors of the 'Encyclopædia Britannica,' died June 1.

Dr. Mackensie, the English surgeon, has written that a microscopic examination made by Dr. Virchow shows that the German Crown Prince's disease is not cancer, but a non-malignant growth. Dr. Mackensie left London June 6 for Berlin and has made another examination. The German Emperor has been so ill as to postpone contemplated visits to watering-places.

The Sultan of Turkey has ceded the island of Cyprus to England.

Count de Montebello and M. Nelidoff, the French and Russian Ambassadors at Constantinople, have lodged objections of their Governments to the ratification by Turkey of the Anglo-Turkish Convention relative to Egypt. M. Nelidoff indirectly charged England with bribing the Grand Vizier with £600,000 and other palace officials with large amounts, to secure their approval of the convention. Russian suspicion of England has shown itself also in the comment of the St. Petersburg Novoe Vremya concerning Bokhara. It warns England that intrigues there, instead of rendering Russia more pliable in accepting the proposed settlement of the Egyptian question, will have a contrary effect.

Native warriors recently invaded British settlements in Sierra Leone, pillaging and burning villages and torturing and killing the native inhabitants and taking 300 prisoners. They tried to capture factories which were stored with valuable merchandise, but were beaten back after a severe loss of life.

The war continues between the troops of the Amir of Afghanistan and the Ghilzais, who are in revolt, but the two armies have for some time retained the same positions, trying to starve each other out.

A chest has been washed ashore near Calcutta that belonged to the captain of the steamer which, with 730 passengers, was recently reported to have been lost in the Indian Ocean. It is thought that they all perished. Most of them were native ladies, who were going to Juggernaut, in Orissa, to celebrate the Juggernaut festival. All the best Hindu families in Calcutta are in mourning for relatives or friends among them. A collision occurred June 6, in the English Channel, between the British bark Hamburg and the British steamer Tern. The steamer was sunk, and her captain and four seamen were drowned.

A ukase has been issued forbidding foreigners to acquire estates on the western frontier of Russia, which is aimed chiefly against the Germans. There are many German factories, workshops, warehouses, and farms there, and most of those who live by them are members of the German Army Reserve.

During a circus performance at Neschen, Germany, June 5, a storm arose and a part of the roof of the circus structure was blown off. The hanging lamps were broken and caused a panic, and the building collapsed. A number of persons were burned, some were trampled to death, and as many as 300 others were more or less hurt.

A fire at Hamburg on the morning of June 1 burned many quays and warehouses and two British vessels, the City of Dortmund and the Gladiator. The loss was several million marks.

The breaking of the dykes of the Theiss River in Hungary has submerged fifty miles of the Alford Plain, near Szegedin, and destroyed much property. In Banat there are 300,000 acres inundated. Many thousands of families are in destitution.

Phylloxera have appeared at Fünfkirchen, in the midst of the Baranda vineyards, the finest in Hungary.

Many houses have been destroyed by a landslip on Spitzen Mountain, near Spiringen, Switzerland, covering an area of two square kilometres. Ten persons were killed and a number were seriously wounded, and many herds of cattle were destroyed.

A plague of locusts has visited the central provinces of Spain. The insects are so thick that gangs of men have been sent to clear the railway lines. The crops are so greatly damaged that the Cortes has been asked to vote a credit for the relief of the sufferers.

The clearing away of the débris from the site of the Opéra Comique was finished June 1, and the number of bodies found was officially reported to be seventy. Some of the Parisian newspapers have declared that there were many more than seventy victims, and that the police have purposely made the number reported far too small.

A motion in the French Chamber of Deputies June 2 that the debate on the Army Bill be postponed until next session, was opposed by Premier Rouvier, who said that the Government intended to maintain the measure as a necessity in the interest and for the honor of the country; and the motion was rejected by 446 to 60.

The Belgian Senate, June 1, by a vote of 38 to 23, approved the bill imposing import duties on cattle and meat.

The King and Queen of Italy attended the ceremony of unveiling a monument at Rome on June 5 to the Italian soldiers who fell in the recent battle at Dogali with the Abyssinians.

The Greek Chamber of Deputies adjourned on June 6, after passing the budget and the bill empowering the Government to contract a loan of $30,000,000.

It was reported from Madrid June 6 that treasure to the value of £95,000,000 had been discovered in the palace of a deceased vizier at Rabat, Morocco, and that the Sultan had confiscated it and was having it conveyed to the imperial coffers.

It has been reported that there were at Santiago de Cuba, on May 27, 280 cases of smallpox known to the authorities, and that perhaps there were 100 more. The deaths from May 1 to 27 numbered 40, not one of the victims having been vaccinated. The disease has appeared at Guantanamo, and it is feared that it will spread to all Cuban ports. The people are ignorant blacks, and are inclined to prayers rather than to vaccination.

The explorers sent out from Hermosillo, Mex., report that there is an active volcano near Bavispe, Sonora, in the Sierra Madre Mountains. The party could not approach nearer than four miles. The crater was pouring forth an immense volume of smoke, fire, and lava, and boiling water was issuing from the side of the mountain, which had destroyed all vegetation in the valleys in the vicinity, and large boulders were hurled down from the crater. The noise was terrific, like a number of engines at work accompanied by sounds of thunder, and the air was dense with smoke and cinders. There are chasms in the earth, and all the roads and trails are wiped out. Not a bird or living thing could be seen within ten miles of the volcano. The town of Bavispe is a complete ruin. The people have all moved out on the high plains, and are living in tents in mortal fear. There has been a constant tremor and a continual series of shocks since the first earthquake.

Two women and three children were killed and a number of people were hurt in a rush of the panic-stricken congregation from the Cathedral at Chihuahua, Mex., June 1, caused by the blazing of inflammable material about the altar, which caught on fire from a candle.

The report was published in the City of Mexico, June 2, on "authentic private intelligence," that a vast organization exists within the Clerical party for the overthrow of the republic and for setting up a throne and placing Don Carlos on it. A number of wealthy Spaniards, infatuated with the wild hope of restoring the days of Spanish ascendency, are said to be implicated, but the prime movers are the priests. Most of the Mexican newspapers and politicians ridiculed the paper which published the report.

In the Canadian Parliament on June 6 the Minister of Justice strongly opposed the motion for a general jail delivery in the hour of the Queen's jubilee. He thought that there could be no more foolish way of celebrating the jubilee than by freeing those whose sole aim was to inflict injury on the community. Action on the motion was indefinitely postponed.

There has been little English comment on the increase of Canadian customs duties; but the London Standard, June 6, called it "a selfish policy," and said that it can only tend to sunder the colonies from the mother country.

A farmers' institute at Drayton, Ont., June 3 adopted a resolution favoring the removal of all restrictions on trade between Canada and the United States.

The trial of the cases of the seized American fishing schooners D. J. Adams and Ella M. Doughty was begun in the Admiralty Court at Halifax June 2.

The request of the captain of an American fishing schooner to be allowed to procure ice at Halifax, N. S., has been refused by the customs authorities.

THE SOUTH AND THE COMMERCE ACT.

THE testimony taken by the Inter-State Commerce Commission at Atlanta, in reference to the suspension of the fourth section of the Commerce Act in the Southern States, shows pretty clearly why the temporary suspension was granted so soon after the act took effect, and why the suspension applied to so large an extent of territory. The secret is, that the railway traffic of the entire South, except Kentucky, Tennessee, and Arkansas, is governed and controlled by the coastwise steamship lines. This fact, although well known to persons immediately interested as merchants or carriers, was certainly not appreciated by the public generally. It could, of course, be perceived by anybody that if the railroads were to carry any goods from New York to Mobile, the rate must be no higher than the steamship rate between the same points. But it was not generally perceived that the same rule would govern as to all interior points in the South which Mobile could supply. At Montgomery and Selma, for instance, the railroad rate from New York was made by adding the New York-Mobile rate to the Mobile-Montgomery rate—that is, the rate which the railroad could charge and did invariably charge to Montgomery was the same that would be charged to a shipper who sent his goods by water to Mobile and thence by rail or river to Montgomery. The same principle was followed in shipments to smaller points for which Montgomery was the natural source of supply. The through-rail rate to one of these third-class towns was the water rate to Mobile, plus the land rate to Montgomery, plus the local rate to the small town. In fact, the whole trade of the coast States from the Potomac to the Rio Grande was moving upon this basis, and indeed, has never, since the war, moved upon any other basis. It was built up according to this plan. It was a perfectly natural plan. It was the same that would have existed if there had been no railroads at all. Mobile would in that case have had the lowest rate. Montgomery would have had a higher rate, but not so high as the small town that received its supplies from her, and so on. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that the Commission took time to consider whether the whole structure of Southern trade and industry should be shaken to its foundations by a sudden reversal of existing business arrangements.

It is useless to anticipate the finding of the Commission upon the investigation which they have undertaken in order to determine whether the suspension of the fourth section shall be continued or not. There are some general considerations, however, which no one can fail to take account of. The first is, that no act of Congress or of the Commission can prevent Southern trade from being dominated by the water lines. The railroads may be compelled to work for less money—it is a question whether they can do so or not. But the highest endeavors of the political branch of the Government cannot prevent Mobile from getting her goods carried at lower rates than Montgomery, except in the improbable event that transportation by land becomes cheaper than by water. What is true of the seaport towns is true of the country adjacent to them. These will always get their goods carried on better terms than the towns more remote from the coast. Compelling the railroads to abandon Mobile to the steamships entirely will not cheapen the rate to Montgomery. That will still be the resultant of the New York-Mobile and the Mobile-Montgomery rate, and the small-town rate will be this plus the local tariff from Montgomery.

Another consideration, and this is of the greatest importance, is, that the business of the South has accommodated itself to the existing arrangement. This is not saying that there may not be special and particular abuses under the general system. Probably there are many such; it would be wonderful if there were not. Not only has business accommodated itself to the system, but the system has to the greatest possible extent made business what it is. The South at the end of the war was tabula rasa in a business point of view. Its resuscitation was very much like settling and building up a new country. All the railroads were in a state of wreck, and all the industries were in like condition. The dominance of the water lines in the matter of transportation was the one fact about which commerce grew and by which the movements and concerns of civilized life were resumed. The then existing railroads adjusted themselves to this fact, and, indeed, could not have done otherwise if they had wished. The newer ones have been built with reference to it. Now, it is exceedingly dangerous to disturb the economic arrangements of a whole country by an act of arbitrary power. Whether these arrangements are right or wrong in themselves, they are part of everybody's daily life. The chances of doing harm by disturbing them are a hundred-fold greater than the chance that the arrangements themselves will work injustice.

Probably the course of future legislation will run something in this way: An effort will be made to enforce the long-and-short haul clause by taking from the Commission the power to suspend it at all; the lesser interests of the South and of the Pacific Coast being preferred for the time being to the greater. After much groaning on the procrustean bed, there will be a relaxation of the long-and-short-haul clause to meet cases of great and glaring hardship, and gradually the Commerce Act will become, what it should have been in the beginning, a correction of injustice, and not an attempt to cure one wrong by committing another and perhaps a greater one.

PROTECTION FOR SUGAR.

SENATOR SHERMAN, in his Springfield speech, reaffirmed his conviction that a reduction of the duty on sugar was necessary to reduce the revenue. Being a firm believer in the doctrine of protection, he proposed to pay a direct bounty to the home producers of sugar to compensate them for the loss of the indirect bounty of the tariff; or, rather, he said that some persons propose to do so. As he was the first one to suggest that policy, it may be inferred that he is included in the number who now propose to introduce the bounty system into American fiscal policy. We have had no direct bounties since the fishing bounties were repealed nearly a quarter of a century ago. Their renewal now would give a spice to politics which has long been lacking. We cannot say that we should lament the introduction of a bill to pay bounties to the sugar-growers. It would cast a new light on the system of State socialism which passes current under the phrase "protection to American industry." The applicability of the system to other industries besides sugar-growing would be immediately apparent. Here, for example, are the fishermen who have got us into a turmoil with Canada, all about a duty on salt fish. It would be so easy to repeal the duty and renew the Washington Treaty by the simple payment of a bounty on all cod and mackerel taken in American bottoms. The complicated strife between the wool-growers and the woollen-manufacturers could be settled in the same way; the duty on wool being repealed, and the shepherds being put on the pension list according to the size of their flocks and the magnitude of the clip produced by each.

There are a great many industries to which the bounty system is peculiarly applicable, but to which protection has failed as yet to apply its invigorating impulse. There is, for example, the tin-plate infant, struggling for life with the meagre protection of 1 cent per pound. Time and again has it presented itself to Congress with a petition for more tariff. It has been met and overcome by the unreasonable protest of the tinsmiths and tin-canners all over the country, the packers of fresh beef, fish, vegetables, and fruits, the condensed-milk men, and scores of narrow-minded people who have contended that their industry was just as "American" as tin-plate making, and more too, because there is more of it. Now a bounty would suit the tin-plate infant exactly. The tin-canners could not object to it because it would not perceptibly increase the price of tin plates. All the benefits of a high tariff would enure to the infant, and he would be spared the vexation and cost of a yearly struggle in Congress with the selfish people who are now repressing his growth. These struggles are always deleterious to the young. Older industries are apt to look upon them as the Knights of Labor look upon apprentices, admitting them only one at a time, and very grudgingly at that. We all remember what trouble the copper-mining infant on Lake Superior had in getting recognized as an infant. Indeed, he never did get recognized until he became a giant. If the bounty system had been in force instead of the tariff system, so that no copper and brass founders and smelters had been particularly incommoded by listening to the cries of the Lake Superior infant, the Calumet and Hecla mine might have been put on the pension list the very day that it was opened.

We have not observed, however, among the other disciples of protection any hearty endorsement of Senator Sherman's proposed sugar bounty. Here is Judge Kelley, for example, quoted in the Manufacturers' Record as greatly impressed with the advantages of Florida as a sugar-producing State. The Judge is convinced, says the Record, "that if proper protection is afforded to the sugar interests of the country, Florida will become the seat of an immense sugar industry that will enrich the whole nation." No mention is made of bounties to enrich the whole nation. Protection is a phrase which has come to have a definite meaning in politics. No voter would understand it to signify the same thing as a pension. Therefore, we may assume that Judge Kelley, so far from intending to "largely reduce this tax," as Senator Sherman proposed at Springfield, and to substitute a bounty in place of it, would perhaps increase it, to the end of enriching the whole nation by making it worth while to plant sugar-cane in Florida. There are other signs of coming disagreement among the champions of protection, but this one relating to sugar is the most threatening. Some of them favor the repeal of the whole internal revenue system as a means of getting rid of the Treasury surplus. This plan is opposed by the greater number, who apprehend trouble with the temperance men, and fear lest the tariff reformers should raise the cry of "free whiskey against taxed sugar." We shall not attempt to decide between them, but we think that the next Presidential campaign will not be devoid of interest if it shall require from those who talk magisterially about protection to American industry some definitions of that phrase, and some particular applications of it to particular industries.

THE QUESTION OF CHURCH UNION.

THE annual meetings of several denominations have been held since the Episcopalians and the Congregationalists were in conjunction—or collision, it is hard to say which—at Chicago last fall, and in all of them, we believe, the question of church union came up in one form or another. The enthusiastic advocates of union will no doubt see in this new and widespread interest in the matter a proof that their hopes are speedily to be realized; but to an outsider it seems difficult to decide whether the various deliverances of official bodies, and the different bases of union put forward, are really parleyings before a truce or sparring before a fight. In a similar way, it is uncertain whether the announcement that the Congress of Churches—that recent organization devised for the very end of church coöperation—will hold no meeting this year, is an indication that its managers consider its work done, or that they see serious obstacles in the way even of such harmony as in the past.

This new movement for coöperation among the churches as a first step and for union as the final result, springs from two classes of impulses. Sentiment of one sort and another has much to do with it. There is a feeling of shame on the part of many at the divided condition of Protestant Christendom, especially at the fact that its divisions are almost wholly traditional, as they believe, and without a present justifying ground. This feeling sometimes emerges in regretful comparisons of fragmentary Protestantism with the solidarity of the Catholic world. Sometimes it arises from a sense of the vast forces in the modern world opposed to the Church, or at least indifferent to it, and of the need of uniting against a common enemy. With some this sentimental longing for a consolidation of the sects is due to their studies in the history of the Church, and their conviction of its essential oneness through all the centuries; in others it is caused by their conception of a National Church, embracing all Christians, as essential to the idea of a church at all. In Mr. Maurice this tendency of thought was clearly marked, and from him it seems to have passed to many others. Practical considerations are also behind the movement. The unnecessary cost of maintaining several distinct and antagonistic churches where one would suffice, is beginning to be felt. The business sense of the managers of church boards and missionary societies is rebelling against the manifest waste involved in present methods. The business men in the churches, so far as their attention has been drawn to this aspect of the case, are unanimous in thinking that a remedy should be sought for the extravagance of the existing competitive system in a scheme of comity, alliance, or, if need be, union.

With such a two-fold force back of it, it is not surprising that the movement should be gathering headway and gaining importance. It seems to us, however, that one vital element in the whole problem has been for the most part curiously overlooked. We mean the thoroughly different attitudes, towards the question of church union, of churches in the city and of those in the country. The former, as a class, are for union, or something approaching it; the latter, as a class, are against it. This difference springs, of course, out of the different conditions of social and thus of religious life, to be encountered in city and country. The great massing of people in the large cities has of itself done much to obliterate denominational distinctions there, and to bring about a state of general tolerance and good feeling. With such a vast population in reach, especially with such great numbers not reached at all, the rivalry of churches along the old lines becomes absurd. And practically it is far less the denomination of a church than its location, the eminence of its pastor, or the attractiveness of its choir, that operates in its favor. In the small towns, however, of stationary or diminishing population, the case is wholly different. Denominational preference is there a matter of inheritance as truly as the family name. The stratified prejudices of generations are built into the foundations of the separate churches. Open strife between the sects is now rare, it is true, even in the country, but a keen rivalry, a suspicious watchfulness, a petty jealousy, are still common. More than this, it is a frequent thing for church relationships to accompany and mark rank in the social scale. To belong to a given church is to be in "society," to be a member of another is to be under social disqualification.

All this is well known, we presume, and it is clear that to substitute for such a state of things a union of churches would be equivalent to a sweeping social revolution. Any new idea is proverbially slow in finding lodgment in the rural mind, and that mind would be simply aghast at the prospect of a change of the nature proposed. As the villages of the country, stranded at one side of the stream of population, are exactly the places where the need for church union is most crying, so they are also the places where opposition to such union is and will be the most intense. Anything to exalt and emphasize denominational peculiarities the country may be depended upon to advocate; anything to minimize them it is certain to oppose. It was noteworthy at the Episcopal Convention that the dioceses whose delegates voted most solidly for the change of the name of the Church into something which would be generally taken as exclusive, were the feebler and less populous ones. Of like significance is the fact that the Chicago Interior, the organ of the provincial Presbyterian churches of the Northwest, fairly foams at the mouth when it speaks of the action of the New York Presbytery ("ministers with rich wives, and professors," it calls that body) in "hailing" the action of the Bishops looking towards church union.

We refer to these matters only to remind those interested that they will have to be reckoned with. It seems plain to us that it will be long before the social traditions of the country churches can be so broken up as is implied in the proposition to wipe out sectarian lines. As the strength of church life at present is dependent in a very large degree upon social relations, it is evident that a great social obstacle in the way of a church movement such as is the one we refer to, must be a serious obstacle.

THE PRESENT CONDITION OF IRELAND.

DUBLIN, May 21, 1887.

A RAILWAY journey in the south of Ireland, with a sojourn of a few days in Cork and Waterford, has set me thinking much upon the actual condition of the country, especially as compared with the past. It is the cue of the inhabitants of most countries to make the best of the spot of earth "wherein it has pleased Providence to cast their lot." Here the opposite tendency prevails, and I cannot but think it has a materially depressing effect upon our fortunes. All parties speak as if it were their interest to represent affairs in the most miserable condition possible, and worse now than ever before. Nationalists desire to show the blighting effects of British rule; Protestants maintain that real progress is impossible in a country where priestcraft prevails; and adherents of the Government generally throw all the blame upon the machinations of a horde of needy agitators distracting a naturally well-inclined people from their legitimate occupations. "Bad as the state of Ireland has been since the Union, it never was worse than at present—has not our once happy population of 8,000,000 been reduced below 5,000,000 by landlord greed and alien rule?" "Infamous as has been the course of Irish agitation from O'Connell downwards, never before has Ireland been coerced as it is at the present moment by Parnell and his gang—little wonder that business is at a standstill, that our cities are falling into ruins, and that the life-blood of the country is leaving our shores."

The truth is, apart from political acerbities, Ireland was never, upon the whole, in a better condition for those living in it than it is at the present moment. There is much distress among evicted tenants and those who are holding on in despair to little pieces of land, from which under any Government or social arrangement they could hardly wring a living. The profits of farming are greatly reduced. There is no little distress among landowners—helpless ladies and the like—due to legal reductions of rent, and fair and unfair refusals to pay on the part of tenants. Consequent on the importation of American flour, and the increased output here by the larger mills through the general adoption of roller machinery, the flour millers of Ireland (once the staple manufacturers of the country) are in considerable difficulties. Most of the smaller mills have been permanently closed, and with the larger mills, unless some unlooked-for turn comes in the flour trade, it has almost become a question of the survival of the fittest. Nevertheless, upon the whole, the mass of the inhabitants of Ireland are in a happier condition than before. We cannot reasonably wish to recall our population of 8,000,000 living in the squalor and wretchedness which prevailed within my memory between 1840 and the famine of 1846-47. Ruined homesteads and depopulated villages may appear mournful, but how did their inhabitants live? How could they ever have lived here; and how are their descendants now living by the Hudson and the St. Lawrence? That the change was beneficial for them and their descendants in no wise justified the coercive legislation and the agrarian oppression by which it was effected. There is something appalling in the depopulation which has gone on in Ireland during the Victorian era. It remains to be seen under home rule to what extent this has been due to natural causes, to what extent it can be prevented or modified by political institutions.

Meanwhile Ireland was never more profoundly discontented than at present, mainly because she never was stronger or better educated. An English statesman once proposed, as a panacea for Irish discontent, a bridge connecting her with England, or a steam ferry free at the expense of the Government. But, in fact, our discontent has increased with increased communication with Great Britain and the United States. Political subjection has become intolerable to the Irish peasant and artisan since they have been enabled to compare the institutions under which they live with those which their expatriated fellow-countrymen enjoy elsewhere. The Irish land system has been doomed since the peasant-proprietary and simple-transfer systems of your country have been brought within ten days of our shores.

I saw nothing in the south of Ireland indicative of widespread and general distress. I was impressed with the superiority of the poorer class generally in and about Cork to the more mixed race here in Dublin; the former striking me as more pure-blooded and capable. I particularly noticed the comfortable, decent appearance of the emigrants who, at Mallow and other stations, were taking the train for Queenstown—pleasing, bright, well-dressed girls; fine, able young men clad in strong garments. I could not but contrast them with the wretched-looking Irish emigrants of twenty years ago, and contrast the short and well-appointed ocean passage of to-day with the long weeks of misery endured in the "coffin" sailing ships that, in the famine times, took in their human cargoes at our ports. The cheerfulness of our present emigrants contrasted strikingly with the anguish which used to characterize our departing exiles. America is, in truth, now as near to us in idea as Belfast was to Cork a few years ago. The voyage is little dreaded, and America is, in familiar thought, almost a part of Ireland.

What is the cause of the increased exodus which has marked this spring? The Unionist papers say that some are fleeing from the tyranny of the National League, and others because they dread the baneful operations of the Crimes Act. It is really due to various causes: the apparent revival of trade in the United States, the continued agricultural depression here, the deferment of the hope of a speedy settlement of the agrarian and national question. No doubt, this continued depopulation of our country arises largely from causes beyond our control; no doubt, most of these emigrants will be far happier with you than would be possible in Ireland; but it is hard to bear philosophically the permanent departure from us of our young men and women, such as crowded the cars in which I travelled from Thurles to Cork.

The Irish Catholics ought to feel proud of the beautiful churches, cathedrals, monasteries, and schools with which they have covered the country since their emancipation under O'Connell. We Protestants cannot like the system, but to them it is everything elevated, pure, and holy, and we should try to regard it from their standpoint and remember the good effect it has had upon them. Probably no other people so poor, entirely out of their own pockets, and without Government assistance, ever in like time erected so many beautiful buildings. Fifty years ago Catholic churches, as a rule, were slated, meeting-house-like buildings—in towns, generally hidden away in back streets; now they are handsome cut-stone erections, often of stately proportions, crowning hill-tops and dominating our villages and towns. They have cost much money. They have withdrawn millions sterling from reproductive investment. I have heard Catholic priests and laymen question the good results of such outlay upon the economic condition of the country. Yet, no doubt, on the whole it has had an elevating and educating influence and added to the people's self respect. It would be hard to foretell the results of such an establishment of the religious orders as has been going on and is still going on over Ireland. Protestants may safely leave it to be dealt with by the Catholic people themselves. If by Catholics considered desirable, the Church will be curbed here as it has been in other Catholic countries, and this will be done all the sooner and more effectually if Protestants only have the sense not to interfere.

It would be hard to estimate the educational effect which the establishment of the National League branches is producing in Ireland. Our people generally never had any previous similar training. They form little parliaments, where the people learn and are learning the conduct of affairs. They are carried on for the most part by the people themselves—often, it is true, with the help of the Catholic clergy of the locality (not always the men most apt for worldly affairs); generally without any assistance from the upper or better-educated classes. These societies are often crude and narrow; their proceedings are sometimes rather wild, liable to be mixed up with all sorts of affairs, and frequently, no doubt, are turned to private ends by designing individuals. If passing resolutions could remedy the ills of humanity, there would be little to complain of in Ireland. Membership in these branch societies would be intolerable to many Nationalists who are members of the Central League in Dublin; still, they have, upon the whole, a most beneficial effect.

One sign of the increasing spirit of the people is the general establishment of foot ball and hurling clubs, and the Gaelic athletic associations. Our old games had almost died out; we never, as a people, took to the close playing necessary for cricket and such amusements. Within the last few years hurling has been revived, and the thud of the foot-ball is now a common sound in spare hours, and on Sundays and holidays, all over the country. It was most interesting in Cork to see the thousands who poured out every Sunday to the race-course to witness play between clubs from neighboring districts. Shut out from any general military discipline and volunteering, and from the management of our affairs, we are, of all the peoples I know, most untrained, the least accustomed to meeting and learning to contest and differ without loss of temper. The increase of manly exercises among the people is to be regarded as a distinct gain, and in itself a moral discipline. Another old Irish, or Anglo-Irish, game is (under the present policy of the police to interfere as little as possible with ordinary offences not savoring of agrarian agitation or politics) coming again into vogue. I refer to the bowling by opposing parties along the roads from one town or village to another, especially in the south of Ireland. Iron balls of one-pound to two-pound weight are used. It is a game requiring great skill and dexterity, frightfully dangerous to vehicles and foot-passengers when a proper lookout ahead is not kept, and strictly forbidden by law, but universally practised. The balls are openly sold in our country towns.

So long as I can remember, it has been the tendency of the trading and mercantile classes here to make out that they were on the verge of ruin. This discourages possible competitors and applications for subscriptions. They now declare themselves worse than ever—"Parnell and the National League have undone the country;" yet during all these years the requirements and style of living of these classes have been rising, and the men who now say they are being ruined are living in a way that to their grandfathers would have appeared princely. Compared to what is called "progress" in other countries, there is little in Ireland. Upon the whole, nevertheless, I fail to see that the classes to which I refer, and among whom I live, are in a worse condition than they have been. We cannot be always increasing our scale of comfort, we cannot expect greater and greater luxuries, and the many distractions now within our reach, without paying for them. Our sons and daughters cannot avoid the competition in life now inevitable with the sons and daughters of our workpeople, who by their education at the national schools are as well qualified, and by their rougher bringing up in some respects better adapted, for the battle of life.

With reference to this outcry of general ruin, I have been interested in looking up the latest available statistics:

	Total profits of the business, trades, and professional classes in Ireland returned for income tax.	Total poor-law expenditure in Ireland, considerably increased of late years by the free distribution of outdoor relief.
1877	£8,382,823	£ 780,326
1878	8,642,722	845,608
1879	8,711,456	847,955
1880	8,365,578	929,967
1881	8,210,397	965,128
1882	8,192,482	967,483
1883	8,288,571	1,042,845
1884	8,536,104	945,930
1885	8,588,948	887,906
1886	Not published	904,018

From these figures it would appear that upon the whole the better class of traders who pay income tax have not suffered appreciably; while the poor are better off than they were a few years ago.

Dublin, where for the most part the non-absentee aristocracy and landowners deal, is said in especial to have been ruined by the agitation. I cannot see it, either in the general appearance of the city or in the mode of life of those around me. The condition of the poor in Dublin mainly depends upon that of the middle and upper classes. The following figures show the average rate per pound on the valuation for poor relief in the city for the past ten years. No alteration has occurred in the valuation of the city or the incidence of the tax to take away from the value of these figures for comparison.

1879	2s. 3d.	1884	2s. 9d.
1880	2s. 4d.	1885	2s. 5d.
1881	2s. 4d.	1886	2s. 1d.
1882	2s. 9d.	1887	1s. 10d

According to this table there is now less poverty in Dublin than for the past ten years. D. B.

FRANCE AND THE ARMED PEACE.

PARIS, May 19.

WE have just gone through a second war panic, and this time it may be said without exaggeration that the emotion, though of shorter duration than that which accompanied the late elections in Germany, was even more acute. In truth, the state of Europe is most painful. It is probably difficult for an American to realize the condition of a country like France, where military service has become obligatory, where every man between twenty and twenty-five belongs to the active army, every man between twenty-five and thirty to the reserve of the active army, every man between thirty and thirty-five to what is called the Territorial Army, and, finally, every man between thirty-five and forty to the reserve of the Territorial Army. And this reserve, this Territorial Army, are not myths, they are not merely on paper: the reservists must serve terms of twenty-eight days, the territorials terms of thirteen days. Every man has his livret, a little pocket-book in which his duty is set down; he knows where he has to go in case of a mobilization, after how many days he is expected to be in the ranks. The work of mobilization has been prepared in the minutest details; it is thought that the first combatant ready will have great advantages over his adversary, and in consequence everything has been arranged in view of this sudden preparation.

It is hardly possible to imagine what would be the social effects of a mobilization. One of my friends, who is director of a coal mine, has just studied the effects of a mobilization merely in the mining districts. His statistics show that more than half the miners would have to leave their work immediately, the youngest and the strongest, those who work in the depths of the mine; he calculates that the home product of all the French coal districts would necessarily be diminished more than half; the importation of foreign coal might, in case of war, become an impossibility, and in that case there would not be coal enough in the country for the railroads and for the necessities of the special industries which war would not arrest. This is only one instance of the great trouble which a war would produce, and many others could be found.

Besides the economical and the social aspects of the question, there is the political aspect; and here I know that "incedo per ignes." But surely the history of the last war and of the Commune which followed it is not reassuring; and, if I speak of the Commune, it is necessary to say that, though this terrible and bloody movement of the Commune only broke out after the preliminaries of peace had been signed, the Commune had a virtual existence during the whole siege. I would advise all those who wish to have distinct proofs of it to read a very remarkable little volume, 'Memories of the late Franco-German War' ('Récits sur la dernière guerre,' etc.), by M. Sarazin, Head-Surgeon of the First Corps of the French Army. Sarazin followed the corps d'armée of Gen. Ducrot; he was in the midst of Wissembourg, of Reichshoffen, of Sedan, and escaped by way of Belgium to Paris. His testimony is very valuable, being that of a brave soldier and a true patriot. He shows, for instance, that the only two regular regiments of the line which were left in Paris during the siege lost as many men and officers as the 350,000 national guards who paraded before Trochu. Would the male population of Paris, between twenty and forty, consent to leave the capital, in case of a new war? Would there not, at any rate, be a refractory nucleus, composed of the worst elements of Paris, and determined to remain near the centre of government, all ready for revolution and for disorder? It is impossible not to put such questions, nor to see their relation to the character of future events.

For the reasons which I have rapidly set forth, it may be affirmed that the French, as a nation, have no desire for war. It is asking too much to ask them to forget altogether what they suffered and lost in 1870; but, till a very recent period, it cannot be denied that the French, though they reorganized their army and altered their military institutions after the Prussian model, have not been a perturbing element in European politics, and have not shown an undue desire to form alliances, to foment intrigues, and to prepare difficulties for their neighbors. There has not been, in the complicated division and subdivision of French parties, a party which could be called a war party. We have lived, in some sense, very quietly for a number of years, and we have enjoyed for a long time a certain sense of security.

It must be confessed that this sense of security is gone; it would be difficult to explain exactly why. Such changes cannot be laid entirely to one man: they are somewhat like changes in the atmosphere. Of course some men have assumed responsibilities of a dangerous character, but would they have assumed them if they had not felt that they could do so? There is certainly no real war party in the country, but the generation now coming to the front is not exactly in the same state of mind as the generation which saw the war and the Commune. No man has ever learned much from another's experience. The youngest generations hardly believe in the possibility of a new Commune. They admit willingly that in time of war every man between the ages of twenty and forty would enter the ranks of the army, and that Paris, inhabited for a while only by older people, would be as easy to keep in order as any other town. They believe that France is better prepared for a war than she was in 1870; but the prevailing sentiment is a sort of wearying of the present uncertainty. It was thought after 1870, when France paid so readily the enormous ransom which had been put upon her, that her resources were almost endless; some foolish people went so far as to say that our milliards had not enriched Germany, but had impoverished her. It became a sort of axiom that the system of armed peace could be better and longer borne by France than by Germany; the two countries had to run a sort of race of expenditure, and we flattered ourselves that in this race we should be first in the end. But figures do not lie, and for some years our budgets have been less and less satisfactory. Certainly, the great armaments, the perpetual changes in the army, have not been the only cause of the decadence of our finances: the democratic government has not been a cheap government; the number of functionaries has augmented in an alarming proportion. Electric railways have been built in quiet districts which had excellent roads; every village has had a new school-house, built in the most pretentious style; expeditions have been made to distant countries; the experiments of the navy have been extremely costly. Still, it cannot be denied that the chief cause of the deficit has been the perpetuation of what can only be called the system of armed peace.

At the present moment the financial question has become the most pressing; everybody feels that the weight has become too heavy, everybody speaks of retrenchment and reform, but there is no minister strong enough to impose a good financial policy. People speak of retrenchment in the abstract, but when it comes to any special and particular form of retrenchment, the Deputies are afraid to vote it. They keep promising all sorts of things to their electors, and every electoral district is willing that the promises made to other districts should not be kept, but it insists on the full execution of the promises made to itself. It would be unjust to say that the finances of the country are in complete disorder. There are fortunately old administrations which preserve certain traditions; the public functionaries are, on the whole, remarkably honest; the organism is still sound; the disorder is not in the executive department, it is in the Legislature. The Chamber of Deputies has no financial policy, it is constantly led away by political passions, it is in a state of complete anarchy as regards financial questions. The dangerous state of our finances is somewhat hidden to the eye by the high quotations of our public funds. A great banker told me only a few days ago that, for himself, he deplored these high quotations; they are due to the fact that the French have completely given up, even in the remote country districts, the habit of hoarding their money (a habit which, by the by, enabled the country to pay the five milliards of the war indemnity with a rapidity which surprised the world). Great banks of deposit exist now, which have agencies in all the departments; these banks receive all the small savings of the people, they constantly drain the country, and pay a certain interest on sums which in old times earned no interest. The saving disposition of the people has contributed to the success of these great banks; they have now enormous sums in their hands, and, so far, no great crisis has contributed to shake the confidence of the country in their solvability. In prosperous times, a great part of these deposits would be used by the banks for new enterprises, but nobody dares now to enter into any combinations which require time for their development; money is idle, and, as the banks are obliged to invest their deposits in order to pay interest to the depositors, they look for the safest investments, and they buy nothing but public funds, railway bonds guaranteed by the State, and treasury bonds. The banks have in this manner made an artificial price for the public funds, as a sudden crisis would soon show; and the fall in the public funds would become alarmingly rapid. The quotations of the Bourse cannot, therefore, deceive the economists; the state of the public finances is not sound, the burden of the French budget has become too heavy even for a frugal and laborious nation.

The danger of the situation which I have tried to describe, in a political sense, lies in this: a time may come when the nation will feel that war may be as easy to bear as armed peace. War does not last long. It may end in defeat, it may also end in victory; in any case it must bring a settlement, a period of rest during which the war establishment can be reduced. A man may be more willing to endure great sufferings for a few hours than to bear a constant pain; war can be looked upon by the nation as a dangerous operation is looked upon by a patient. There was a time when we believed that France could bear the burden of armed peace better than Germany; the study of the budget of the German Empire has dispelled this notion. All those who have examined this budget know that the burden of Germany is by far the lightest, that the Empire has, so to speak, no debt. The Journal des Économistes published a few months ago an excellent article on the German finances, showing very conclusively that Germany has organized herself as an Empire at a comparatively small cost. We cannot expect to see her crushed by degrees under the weight of debt; we must reconcile ourselves to the idea that she can continue for an indefinite period to make the sacrifices she is making now. France is not yet fairly aware of this important fact; those only who can read a budget and compare budgets, know exactly the state of things. It is perhaps as well that this knowledge should not become too general, as it might create a feeling of despair, and inspire the nation with an imprudent desire to try the fortune of war rather than to continue a financial struggle which to many eyes seems hopeless.

WEIMAR AND THE GOETHE-GESELLSCHAFT.—A NEW FAUST.

WEIMAR, May 22.

SAINT-MARC GIRARDIN described in 1830 his impressions of the relation between German literature and Goethe. With this literary monarch, he thought, the old literary régime would descend to the tomb. And after visiting Weimar, where he beheld Goethe, no longer in the fulness of his powers, with the majestic brow that seemed "weary of thought," he felt a subtle association between the failing sage and the decadent capital, type of a decentralized land. The passing traveller to day can scarcely avoid at first the same impression. Sown in a hollow of the rolling hills around it, Weimar seems to withdraw itself from the inquisitive eye. One finds a fringe of suburbs where the stucco fronts, now so common in German domestic architecture, play a principal part; but the heart of the town is as yet lightly touched by modern inroads. Alleys guiltless of sidewalks still loiter among the leading streets; the travelling booth is seen in the public square; and the taverns, consequential, possibly, in their day, have degenerated into respectable mediocrity. But Weimar is merely faithful to itself and to the early and unspoiled simplicity of life which has been noted and admired by many observers. The ghosts and traditions of the past continue all-powerful, although the living links with Goethe's time are fast breaking. Few persons, indeed, remain alive who can speak of seeing the poet in their youth, fewer still who had personal relations with him. A life-long resident of Weimar could recall but one or two such in his native place and in adjacent Jena. Bancroft and Calvert in America are probably the sole survivors of the host of foreigners who crossed the friendly Salve of Goethe's threshold.

The central point of interest for the visitor is, of course, the Goethe house, now transformed into a museum for the preservation and exhibition of Goethe's cabinets of natural history and rich art collections, which, as is now well known, possess not only a personal, but a scientific interest. Preliminary descriptions have already appeared on both sides of the Atlantic, and Robert Keil's readable sketch affords for the present a useful guidance. Hofrath Ruland, however, the experienced director of the ducal museum, who has also charge of the Goethe collections, is preparing a thorough catalogue, which will be based upon the original family documents, and will present an accurate history of the house and all its contents. Accompanying this catalogue a series of fine photographs of the more important objects will be published with descriptive text. Among the recent discoveries made by Director Ruland may be mentioned a death-mask of Schiller and an extensive collection of sketches and drawings done by Goethe and carefully pasted into a huge blank book, forming a kind of illustrated diary of his Italian journey. The task of arranging and assorting the contents of the house has been rendered doubly difficult, as no one now remains who could afford definite information or reliable reminiscences. The eccentric grandsons, possessed as they were by a species of pious mania, kept even those who were near to them in friendship (perhaps preferably such) aloof from the ancestral treasures, which they yielded up only with their lives; and carried to the grave whatever recollections of the past they may have retained.

The Goethe archives, bequeathed directly to the Grand Duchess, are at present lodged in a wing of the palace in which her own apartments are situated. The wealth of manuscripts which they contain has been already indicated in the Nation, and certain specimens have appeared in print. Their full importance, however, will be appreciated only when the great and final edition of Goethe's works, which will comprise perhaps one hundred volumes, is completed. No one anticipates that the prevailing estimate of Goethe and his productions will be essentially modified; but, on the other hand, additional light will be thrown upon a great variety of episodes in his life, and the elucidation of many of his writings will be materially furthered. An illustration of this may be cited in the recent publication of a portion of the original letters from Italy to Frau von Stein and Herder in 1786–87, which form the basis of his 'Italian Journey,' appearing thirty years later. Here is still the same fresh, limpid early utterance which was first revealed to us a few years ago in the Bernays edition of the ante-Weimar period. An examination of these original letters gives an instructive view of Goethe's method of literary workmanship in the editing of his own materials, and also permits us to obtain a more distinct conception of his feelings during that time toward Frau von Stein.

The mention of this final edition of Goethe calls up involuntarily the name of its guiding spirit, William Scherer. In Weimar his death was felt as keenly as in Berlin, and his loss has necessitated a general rearrangement of functions. His place as member of the executive committee of the Goethe Society is taken by Prof. Herman Grimm. Erich Schmidt, the former director of the archives, although remaining one of the various editorial collaborators, has been called to Berlin in Scherer's stead as professor of German literature, having, like Scherer, previously filled a similar position at Strassburg and Vienna; and Prof. Suphan comes from Berlin to Weimar in the place of Prof. Schmidt. If it be added that Prof. Geiger, editor of the Goethe-Jahrbuch, is a member of the philosophical faculty of the Berlin University, and that Herr von Loeper, the accomplished Goethe commentator, has been drawn from Berlin to Weimar in the interests of the new edition, it becomes manifest how leading a rôle the German capital is taking in this great literary enterprise. Prof. Suphan is favorably known as the editor of the final edition of Herder's works, the concluding volumes of which will appear within the next two years: and the experience which he has acquired in this undertaking admirably equips him for his present task.

The annual meeting of the Goethe-Gesellschaft, with upwards of two hundred members present, was held on the 21st of May. A shade of seriousness pervaded the assembly, owing to the deaths of Prof. Scherer and (recently) of Herr von Loën, the general manager of the ducal theatre and an officer of the Shakspere, Schiller, and Goethe Societies—a kindly and helpful character, under whose administration of twenty years the Weimar stage was distinguished for the early and elaborate presentation of Wagner's operas to the German public, and for the production of the second part of "Faust." A preliminary meeting of the Executive Committee had been held on the previous day, after which the members of the Committee, the officers of the Society, and a few others were invited to dine at court. The proceedings of the general meeting were of varied interest. The usual routine reports were made on the condition of the different activities of the Society, and the increasing prosperity of the organization was satisfactorily established. The total membership is not far from 3,000, including the 200 members of the auxiliary English society, none of whom, however, were present. Berlin has alone over 400 members, Austria over 300, Russia 54, America 46, Switzerland 29, Italy 21, the Netherlands 11, France 9, while 16 members are scattered through Norway and Sweden, Denmark, Belgium, Spain, Greece, Turkey, India, China, and Australia. It was announced that the Cohn Library, a small but exceedingly choice collection of original editions of Goethe and of other rare volumes essential for the proper editing of his writings, had been purchased for the Society. The price paid for the 800 works was stated to be 16,000 marks. As the library of the Society also comprises a number of purchases from the Hirzel auction and the Goetheana in Wolfgang von Goethe's collection, the work of editing may now be advantageously prosecuted. The next publication of the Society will be a facsimile edition of an album of twenty-two leaves containing sketches and drawings by Goethe, and illustrating, to quote his own conviction, his artistic powers, desires, and deficiencies. It was his wish that the leaves should remain intact, and he had provided a brief introduction, to be included in the publication, which will be under the judicious charge of Director Ruland. The further announcement was made that during the coming year half-a-dozen volumes of the Goethe edition would appear, embracing portions of the poems, the diaries and correspondence, and "Faust."

The special address for the occasion was made by Prof. Suphan, who spoke with much feeling and acumen of the personal and intellectual relations existing between Goethe and Herder. For Erich Schmidt, who is to edit the "Faust," was reserved the pleasure of communicating to the assembly the discovery of a copy of probably the earliest version of Goethe's "Faust," including twenty scenes, principally of the Gretchen tragedy, which he was fortunate enough recently to unearth. Students of Goethe are aware that, whereas the first part of "Faust" was not published until 1808, an earlier fragment appeared in 1790, portions of which were undoubtedly done in the old Frankfort days, while other passages were evidently worked over at the time of the Italian journey. Conjecture has long been rife regarding the period of production of the several scenes, and Scherer even maintained the probable existence of an original prose sketch. Writing from Rome March 1, 1788, Goethe refers to the "Faust" manuscript which, years before, he had brought from Frankfort to Weimar, and to which at that time we find frequent allusion. He speaks of having just made a scheme for "Faust," an operation in which he hoped for success.

"To be sure," he adds, "it is another matter to finish the piece now instead of fifteen years ago; I fancy that it will lose nothing thereby, especially since I believe that I have now recovered the clue. I have already completed a new scene (die Hexenküche), and if I smoke the paper a little, I think that no one would detect it among the others. The old manuscript often gives me food for reflection when I see it before me. It is the very first, and written off in the principal scenes without plan; it is now so yellow with time, so jumbled up, so worn and ragged on the edges, that it really looks like the fragment of an old codex."

The present treasure trove is a copy of that earlier and fundamental version, and will necessitate a revision of the textual criticism of the whole first part, with a date as starting-point antecedent by many years to 1790.

Scarcely less interesting than the discovery itself was the way in which it was brought about. Every reader of Goethe's biography will recall the lively little maid of honor, Fräulein von Göchhausen, with whom, in the first wild days at Weimar, Goethe and the Duke were wont to play such pranks. Members of her family now living in Dresden possessed a quantity of apparently unimportant papers which had been handed down from generation to generation. The Grand Duchess, making inquiries among acquaintances in Dresden for Goethe memorabilia, learned of the existence of these papers, and, through her intercession, the family permitted access to them. Prof. Schmidt was despatched to examine the collection, and observed among other documents of little consequence a large blank book or album filled, after the current fashion, with copies of various popular specimens of German literature. Turning over the leaves, he suddenly came across some absolutely unknown lines from "Faust," and here at last, preserved by the pious hand of the much-abused little dame, appeared an apparently faithful copy of the precious document, the famous time-stained codex of the Italian journey, the lost manuscript of the modern scholiasts, for which in the Goethe archives search had so long and fruitlessly been made. For the second part of "Faust" abundant material has been found, as its composition occupied, of course, the closing years of Goethe's life; and the cycle may now be considered to be in a measure complete. A detailed description of this fragment would attract, perhaps, only the smaller circle of those devoted to the closer study of Goethe; but the "kecker Wurf" and the broken and rugged vehemence of many of the passages from the dialogue between Mephisto and the student, the carousal in Auerbach's cellar, and above all the thrilling prison scene, which was declaimed by Prof. Schmidt with marked effect, form a vivid reminiscence of the storm-and-stress period of Goethe's life, and contribute a number of characteristic and striking touches to the picture of his tempestuous development.

The twenty scenes from the first part of the drama which the manuscript comprises are a mixture of prose and verse, and embrace especially those in which Gretchen appears. The order is nearly the same as in the later editions, beginning with the monologue of Faust, the opening lines of which, preserving more faithfully the system of rhyming couplets, deviate slightly from the subsequent version:

> "Hab nun ach die Philosophey,
> Medicin und Juristerey,
> Und leider auch Theologie
> Durchaus studirt mit heisser Müh!"

The scene with the earth spirit is included, a dialogue with Wagner, and the interview between Mephisto and the student, which is drastic in its execution. The revel in Auerbach's cellar is almost entirely in crude sophomoric prose, a noteworthy feature of which is that here as in the Volksbuch it is still Faust and not Mephisto who outwits and befools the students. Between Auerbach's cellar and the first meeting of Faust and Gretchen comes the short scene before the cross on the highway. ("Was giebt's, Mephisto? hast du Eil?") The entrance of Mephisto is lacking, as well as the attempt at suicide, the Easter promenade, and the later scenes between Mephisto and Faust. Of Gretchen at the first view Faust says:

> "Das ist ein herrlich schönes Kind,
> Die hat was in mir angezünd't."

In the scene in Gretchen's chamber, her exclamation at sight of the jewel-case is peculiarly naïve:

> "Was Guckguck mag dadrinne seyn!"

The ballad of the "König in Thule" is given, and several scenes between Faust and Gretchen ensue, the scene at the fountain, before the Mater Dolorosa, and in the Cathedral. In the Valentine scene much is wanting—for example the serenade by Mephisto. The prose scene (Trüber Tag, Feld), and the prison scene, which, save the snatch of song at the beginning, is also in prose instead of verse as later, end the series. The whole fragment will appear in the edition of the first part of "Faust" to be published in the fall, and will probably be exactly reproduced afterwards in a special reprint.

After the general meeting, followed a banquet under the guidance of the presiding officer of the Society, Judge Simson, the President of the Imperial Court of Law, and himself an honored member of the small band of those who knew Goethe in their early years. In the evening the Society became the guests at the ducal theatre of the Grand Duke, who, with the Grand Duchess, had been present at the morning session. The scene in the auditorium was an appropriate termination of a noteworthy occasion, and seemed fittingly to continue the traditions of an older day. One beheld there, among other members of the court, the grandson of Karl August, and his wife, who display the same fostering care for art and letters which distinguished their predecessors a century ago; the Prime Minister, Stichling, who is a grandson of Herder; the Baron von Gleichen-Russwurm, a grandson of Schiller; Frau Grimm, the daughter of Bettina von Arnim, and her gifted husband, whose father and uncle are the par nobile fratrum of German learning. Scattered about the house could be observed the faces of many eminent students and admirers of Goethe whom the event had summoned from all quarters of Germany. From the stage, where Goethe's efforts as director had formerly been all-influential, were heard the classic and noble lines of his 'Iphigenie,' in which, as Orestes, he himself had once made a memorable appearance. Above the stage was a well-executed fresco depicting groups of the poets and composers before whom Shakspere appeared, leading towards the Muse Schiller and Goethe, with the latter a little in advance; but, on leaving the theatre, one was confronted without by Rietschel's familiar and colossal bronze looming darkly in the night, and representing the two poets in an attitude of friendly and reciprocal abnegation. THE STATE DEBT OF TENNESSEE.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In speaking, on page 417, of the compromise offered the State of Virginia by her creditors, you say: "The noble State of Tennessee, for instance, scaled its debt heavily, with the consent of its bondholders, and, after one year, defaulted on its interest, and has been in default ever since."

Here are two errors. Tennessee scaled her debt without the consent of her creditors; and it was a difference of opinion as to her right to do just this thing, which divided the Democratic party from 1877 to 1883, and led to the election of one Republican Governor during that period.

In May, 1882, the State Legislature passed an act to fund the debt at sixty cents on the dollar, with interest beginning at two per cent. and gradually rising to six per cent. But this compromise was never accepted by a majority of the creditors, and was superseded by an act passed in March, 1883. By this act, the bonds were divided into two classes. One class was to be paid in full (less four years of war interest—a deduction made also from all private debts), with six per cent. interest. The other class was funded at fifty cents on the dollar, with three per cent. interest.

A letter just received from Hon. Atha Thomas, State Treasurer, says: "Most of the bonded debt of the State has been funded under this act, as of July, 1883, and all the interest thereon since July, 1883, has been promptly paid in semi-annual instalments. To do this the State borrowed some money, each time, to meet the interest due in July, 1886, and January, 1887."

I find in to-day's paper that Tennessee bonds are quoted in New York at 104 for sixes and 75 for threes.—Yours truly, Campbell Brown.

Spring Hill, Tenn., May 29, 1887.

[Our correspondent evidently supposes we were speaking of the second scaling act, whereas we were speaking of the first. It is natural that he should have been misled by our loose expression, as the fact that there were two scaling acts has almost been forgotten in Tennessee; but it is natural that we should have spoken as we did, since the betrayal of the creditors who funded under the first act is far from being ancient history in this part of the country. If our subject had been repudiation in Tennessee, we should, of course, have spoken more specifically, and said that the State scaled its debt 40 per cent., and, after many of its creditors had consented to it, defaulted on the interest and has been in default ever since; but we were writing of Virginia, and wished to cite Tennessee, in as few words as possible, as an example of the fate awaiting creditors who accept a scaling act.

On May 20, 1882, Tennessee passed the "Compromise and Funding Act," which scaled its debt more than 40 per cent. and, by a refinement of meanness, required (Acts Tenn., 1882, p. 8, sec. 6) its creditors to pay the expenses of exchanging the old bonds for the new. According to the American Almanac (1887, p. 191), some $8,000,000 of these new bonds were issued up to 1883—that is, creditors to that extent were reluctantly persuaded into exchanging their securities by the hope of prompt payment of interest to which the "faith, credit, and honor of the State" were "solemnly pledged" (Acts Tenn., 1882, May 20). Nothing but their consent could have brought about the exchange. Now, what did these creditors profit by accepting the scaling act of the State and paying $2 (Acts Tenn., 1882, p. 8, sec. 6) into the pockets of the State officers for each new scaled bond? On this point we should rejoice to refer our correspondent to the opinion of certain individuals who went through this operation. Their feelings about it are such that, though they will invest East, West, and North, and even in Mexico, they will not invest in any State south of Mason and Dixon's line and east of the Rio Grande.

A single coupon of 1½ per cent. was paid under this settlement, and then the State defaulted and has never made a payment under it since. On the contrary, by March 15, 1883, or before the year was out, the Compromise and Funding Act was repealed, and a new act which scaled the principal and accrued interest of the debt 50 per cent. and reduced the future interest to 3 per cent. was substituted, and it is this act which has been held out to the creditors ever since for acceptance, with the alternative of getting nothing. It is perfectly true that under this alternative the majority of the creditors have been forced to accept the last act, and it is true, too, that the pitiful interest has been paid, but this does not alter the fact that the State betrayed within a year creditors whom it had persuaded into a heavy sacrifice. Virginia has done no worse than this. It too holds out a last scaling act, and those who have funded under it have been paid interest regularly. The difference is this: the creditors of Tennessee were wholly within its power, the creditors of Virginia, owing to the tax-receivability of their coupons, are not. As if to emphasize its avarice and meanness, Tennessee actually forced its creditors to pay for the second exchange of bonds. This insult was too much for many of them. They preferred to sell on the open market for what they could get, or to retain their old bonds. Another wrong, it is to be hoped, arose from an inadvertence which will be remedied. The State expressly exempted educational and charitable institutions within the State from the effect of these two acts, but made no provision for such institutions outside of the State.—Ed. Nation.]

THE GILMAN ARMS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In reviewing 'Crazy Heraldry' in the Nation of May 5, you mention a "serious misquotation" in that book from Mr. Whitmore's 'American Genealogist,' and connect it with the statement that "the Gilman arms are without foundation." The impression is given that Mr. Whitmore made the latter remark.

As there is incidental mention of the "Gilman arms" in my genealogy of the family, I have been asked about this matter. Mr. Whitmore writes to me that, in his book mentioned, he intimates "that as some of the English descendants of Edward Gilman of Caston [England] used the Gilman arms, I [he] presumed other descendants here had an equal right."

The fact is that all the English Gilmans bear the arms given in my book, and they are found on tombstones (in the old church at Hingham, Eng.) over the remains of members of the family who lived two centuries ago, at a time when such things were much more carefully guarded than they are now. In the Nation it is said "there is no good proof of the [Gilman] arms as yet"; but exactly what is meant, I am unable to understand. As I profess no skill in such matters, I gave in my book what was given to me by accredited members of the family in Norfolk, Eng; and if there be any virtue in arms, probably there is as much in those on the Gilman tombs as in any others.—Yours truly,

Arthur Gilman.

EXTREME LONGEVITY.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In the Nation of May 26, p. 447, you express the opinion in the case of William first Lord Cranston, who died in 1627, and Gov. John C., b. in 1626, great-grandson of Lord William and yet born in his lifetime—"if not impossible, it was at least almost incredible."

I am familiar with several such instances. A few years ago we had in our family a laundress, of French Canadian descent, who had several grandchildren, and whose grandmother was then living, a hale, hearty woman of over ninety years. Also, my mother had a cousin, a highly educated lady, with two grandchildren between the ages of two and eight years and a grandmother who afterwards died in her 99th or 100th year. I was acquainted with these families from the old grandmother to the great-grandchildren, and have heard of so many other instances—one, the McElraths of Cleveland, Ohio—that I cannot consider such instances either "impossible" or "incredible."—Respectfully, M. G. F.

"BILLION."

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: With the exception of a mathematician here and there, few Americans, I apprehend, are aware that with the English a billion now signifies—and, as to its prefix, etymologically—"a million millions," which it signified originally. It would be curious to know when our countrymen adopted the meaning which they at present attach to the term, a term unrecognized by Dr. Johnson, and also by the eccentric Dr. Richardson. According to Bailey's Dictionary (ed. 1730) it was used as "intimating that the word millions is twice mentioned, as 6666666600." This blind definition, which Dr. Murray does not refer to, evidences, by its estimating a billion as we estimate it, that in England the sense of the expression has varied. Bailey's explanation of a trillion shows that there is no mistake in the string of figures given above.—Your obedient servant, F. H.

THE CATHEDRAL OF ORVIETO.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I must acknowledge one error in my letter on Orvieto, though not one of any significance as to the church, viz., the substitution of Boniface VIII. for the Guido Farnese assigned by the guide-books as the ecclesiastic who said the first mass. I took the statement from the architect of the church as of his competence to determine, but it would appear that Boniface VIII. was dead when the mass was said. When I get to Orvieto again I will investigate the question, but I can find no Pope on the lists at hand here at that date who could have been in Italy, the See being then at Avignon.—Yours truly,

W. J. Stillman.

Judson; and 'The Order of Words in the Ancient Languages compared with the Modern,' translated from Henri Weil by Prof. Charles W. Super.

Readers of the Magazine of American History have been prepared for the announcement that Mr. William Elliot Griffis has composed a life of 'Matthew Calbraith Perry: a Typical American Naval Officer,' which is to be published in September by Cupples & Hurd, Boston, in a single volume, finely illustrated and well indexed. This work rounds out the list of those relating to Japan produced by the same popular writer—popular in the best sense—and its readability is assured.

A. C. Armstrong & Son will be the American publishers of 'The Story of the Life of Queen Victoria told for Boys and Girls all over the World,' by W. W. Tulloch, son of the late Principal Tulloch, with the Queen's personal revision.

J. B. Lippincott Co. have arranged to publish the 'Report of the Commission appointed by the University of Pennsylvania to investigate Modern Spiritualism, in accordance with the bequest of the late Henry Seybert.' The same firm announce 'Bellona's Husband,' a new novel by Hudor Genone, author of 'Inquirendo Island.'

Brentanos have in press 'Tales before Supper,' from the French of Gautier and of Mérimée, by Myndart Verelst, with an introduction by Edgar Saltus.

'The Sailing of King Olaf, and Other Poems,' by Alice Williams Brotherton, will be published directly by Charles H. Kerr & Co., Chicago.

Mr. Robert Louis Stevenson has just completed a memoir of the late Prof. Fleeming Jenkin. It will be published early this summer.

To Mr. David Douglas's beautifully printed series of little books by American authors there have been added recently Mr. Howells's 'Indian Summer,' in two volumes, Mr. Cable's 'Madame Delphine' (in one volume with 'Carancro' and 'Grande Pointe'), and Mr. Stockton's 'A Borrowed Month,' with six other of his short stories.

'Le Transport par les Chemins de Fer: Histoire—Législation,' by Arthur T. Hadley, translated into French by MM. Raffalovich and Guérin, and with a preface by the former, has just been published in Paris by Guillaumin & Cie. (New York: F. W. Christern).

Worthy of the occasion is the noble volume, from the press of John Wilson & Son, that embalms the proceedings at the 250th anniversary of the founding of Harvard College last November ('Harvard University, 1636-1886: A Record of the Commemoration,' etc., Cambridge). It is an unadorned general account of the preparations, the programme, and the performance of those memorable four days, followed by the full text of the literary exercises, the speeches of guests, alumni, etc. The official personnel, the registration lists of graduates and others in attendance, and the names of the recipients of honorary degrees, enhance the value of this permanently interesting publication. For embellishments, there is a facsimile of the earliest existing record of the College, pertaining, as it happens, to the College seal; a reduced facsimile of the original charter of the College, 1650, probably the oldest (unmodified) of any university in the world; and two views of the College yard in 1821, after paintings.

We may fitly notice in close connection with the foregoing 'The New Education: Three Papers by George Herbert Palmer, Professor of Philosophy in Harvard University' (Boston: Little, Brown & Co.). These papers, as they originally appeared in the Andover Review, attracted marked attention and invited much discussion. Prof. Palmer sought to show how the elective system of Harvard differed from the laissez-faire method with which it was confounded; and whatever may be thought of his success, it is past question that these papers are among the most quickening educational essays of the three years in which they respectively saw the light. Prof. Palmer's exposition of general principles and his engaging style must cause this little volume to be read long after the debate is closed by the logic of accomplished facts. We recommend it to teachers of every station and degree.

Mr. Justin Winsor's antiquarian romance, 'Was Shakespeare Shapleigh? A Correspondence in Two Entanglements' (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.) originally appeared in part in the Atlantic. In book form it contains a second paper, dealing with the voyages of the early discoverers on the west coast of America, and with the Shapley family in New England. Shakspere is identified with Sir William Shapleigh, by verbal tradition recorded in a journal, and by the rather tame expedient of filling out the "W. Sh." of the title-page of the King John Quarto, 1611, in a copy found in the Shapleigh library. It is all very complicated "fooling," and such as only the wise can find extravagantly laughable nonsense. It is refreshing for the laity to observe the names of the Boston local antiquaries figuring seriously in such an escapade of learning.

The second volume of Messrs. McGibbon & Ross's 'Castellated and Domestic Architecture of Scotland' ends the work by bringing their history down to the beginning of the eighteenth century, in the full and careful manner of the first volume, which was noticed a few weeks ago in the Nation (No. 1135, March 31, 1887). Their researches bring out an immense number of castles still standing, in better or worse preservation. The surprise which the reader feels in looking through their descriptions of two hundred and fifty of these castles grows to amazement when he sees subjoined a list of seven or eight hundred more which have been omitted, till he begins to wonder whether the whole mediæval population of Scotland lived in castles. The authors are willing, if they can procure the necessary information, to publish a complete guide-book, or catalogue raisonné, of all the ancient domestic architecture of Scotland. We hope it may be done.

In the fifth series of the Johns Hopkins Historical Studies an account of the city government of St. Louis is furnished by Prof. Marshall S. Snow. It is a rather slight production, the period prior to 1875 being disposed of in ten pages, while that subsequent occupies but twenty-five. Bulk is given to the pamphlet by the addition of more than twenty pages of advertisements. It would appear from this sketch that, until within four or five years, there were no paved streets in St. Louis. The chief peculiarity of the present charter seems to be the provision "by which the important offices filled by the Mayor's appointment are not vacant until the beginning of the third year of his term of his office, so that, as rewards for political work done during a heated campaign, they are too far in the dim distance to prejudice seriously the merits of an election." We should apprehend that this provision would also destroy all responsibility, especially as the appointments of the Mayor must be confirmed by the Council. The Police Commissioners are appointed by the Governor of the State, but the Mayor is ex-officio a member of the Board.

The June number of the Book-buyer contains an engraved likeness of H. Rider Haggard.

A new weekly critical review of literature and art is projected to be published in Boston, with the name (probably) of the Twentieth Century. The editors and promoters are largely Boston journalists; Mr. Ralph Adams Cram, art editor of the Boston Transcript, being manager.

In the American Architect for May 28 Mr. Sylvester Baxter describes with great particularity, and with the aid of numerous illustrations, the remarkable collection of Japanese pottery owned by Prof. Edward S. Morse of Salem, Mass. One of the two rooms in which it is stored is also shown in a general (heliotype) view.

Archbishop Theodore of Canterbury (669 to 690) organized an annual church assembly to be held at Clovesho, "a now forgotten place," says Stubbs (i., p. 231), "in the Mercian kingdom, probably near London." The much-disputed situation of this place appears, from a contribution by C. R. Manning to East Anglia for May, to have been determined at last by Mr. E. J. L. Scott of the British Museum. He has discovered some charters of the time of Henry III., relating to the parish of Mildenhall, Suffolk, and finds the name in question twice, as belonging to a portion of that parish—ad viam Clouenhoe and in campo de Clouenhowe, while allusions to "the old road," "the four roads," etc., show the neighborhood of a Roman road where four ways met. "The 'howe' was, no doubt, a hillock at the 'cloven' ways, where open-air meetings of the Synods of the Saxon Church might be held." There is no trace of the existence of the name at present at Mildenhall. Lying "in the wild heath land on the Ely side of that extensive parish, near the borders of the Mercian kingdom, and within easy reach of the Bishops of Dunwich and Elmham," "such a border tract, a no-man's land, was the very place for such a meeting."

L'Art for May 1 (Macmillan) opens with a first notice of the Salon. It is mostly taken up with unmitigated censure of M. Puvis de Chavannes, and his "toile kilométrique," "Le Soir de la Vie." A few words of hearty praise are given at the end to M. Lucien Laurent-Gsell's "Le Premier Septembre." The artist is a nephew of M. Pasteur, and his picture represents the vaccination of a young child for rabies. Two fragments of it are reproduced in L'Art, including the full-length figure of the savant whose claims are still so much in dispute; and they justify a favorable opinion of the design. Specimens of the engraving of the lamented François Gaillard give a further value to this number.

A population map of Ceylon, in the latest Proceedings of the Berlin Geographical Society (vol. xiv, No. 4) accompanies a discourse on this ever interesting island by Dr. F. Sarasin, who, together with a relative, traversed Ceylon in every direction for two and a half years in pursuit of zoölogical inquiry. The prosperity of the coffee-growing period has not been overtaken, since the blight in the seventies, by tea, cacao, or quinine planting, or by rice culture with the help of the repaired Singhalese tanks. For the hunter and the naturalist, Ceylon is still a paradise. Dr. Sarasin tells of the scanty reverence shown by the Veddahs for the bones of their nearest kindred, which they barely inter, and the removal of which by our scientists charmed them as saving the toil of fresh grave-digging. An extraordinary resemblance between the Veddahs and the negroes of Australia is manifest in a comparison of photographs of both races; but the question is a moot one, and an appeal must be taken to the bones.

The second number of the Supplement to Brockhaus's Conversations-Lexikon contains extended articles on Asia and Bacteria, illustrated with a colored plate. It ends with a notice of the late Dr. Geo. M. Beard of this city, and a list of his works.

The Biblioteca Nazionale Centrale di Firenze, having published a Bolletino of Italian works received by it during 1886, has now issued a "Tavola sinottica" (pp. 97–120) showing which of them are to be found in twenty-six other public libraries of Italy. The method is simple and compendious. The titles in the Bolletino were numbered from 1 to 11,068. Against these same numbers are now set down the initials of the libraries which also have the work. If no library has a particular work, its number is omitted from the list.

The story of Savonarola possesses undying interest, and it is only necessary for us to indicate to students that the classic 'Storia di Girolamo Savonarola e de' suoi tempi,' by Signore Pasquale Villari, has received at his hands a thorough revision, bringing it up to a level with the latest researches made by himself and other scholars. The first volume has just seen the light in Florence, and the second, it is to be hoped, will not be long delayed. For twenty-five years the book has been universally known as the fullest and most accurate account of the meteoric career of Frà Girolamo, and the sources of information have now been so thoroughly explored that, in view of the conscientious labor bestowed on the new edition, we may safely predict that it will not be superseded.

MM. Anatole Cerfberr and Jules Christophe have made an index to Balzac's works, containing a biography of all the characters that figure in the 'Comédie humaine,' indicating the relations they bear to each other and their points of contact. This is published under the title 'Répertoire de la Comédie humaine' (Paris: Calmann Lévy; Boston: Schoenhof). It is uniform with the complete octavo edition in twenty-four volumes published by the same house, and has an introduction by M. Paul Bourget. All those who have tried to follow a personage of Balzac through the maze of his semi-connected novels will be glad of this publication.

We have had occasion several times of late to call attention to very cheap series of French books. The new collection entitled "Auteurs célèbres," begun by Marpon & Flammarion, Paris (Boston: Schoenhof), promises to be one that will provide readers of French with some of the best productions of contemporary authors. It is published at sixty centimes a volume, and there have already appeared in it Zola's 'Thérèse Raquin,' Malot's 'Une bonne Affaire,' Theuriet's 'Le Mariage de Gérard,' Eugène Chavette's 'La Belle Alliette,' etc. Among others is Daudet's 'La Belle-Nivernaise,' with all the illustrations of the ten-franc edition, and the addition of five of the same author's charming southern French legends, the whole forming a neat volume of 250 pages, very clearly printed.

A series of studies upon the literary, artistic, and other celebrities of the Romantic movement in France is about to be begun by the Paris publishers, Ed. Monnier & Cie., under the general title, 'L'Âge du romantisme.' These are to appear in weekly quarto numbers of twelve pages, with portraits, etchings, lithographs in black and colors, both in the text and separately, and reproductions of rare or unpublished vignettes of the period. M. Philippe Burty will have the direction of the critique artistique, and M. Maurice Tourneux of the critique littéraire. The first of the weekly numbers has just been published—'Célestin Nanteuil,' by M. Th. Burty; the second was announced to appear June 1—'Gérard de Nerval,' by M. Maurice Tourneux, both with portraits and numerous illustrations. If the publication cannot be considered an exclusively artistic work, it will at least be a very luxurious, instructive, and curious one in both an artistic and a literary sense. At the same time with these studies of the celebrities of the period the publishers will issue some of the characteristic works of the times, reproductions of original editions, with illustrations and explanations of all kinds. The first of these, which is now in preparation, is 'La Bohème galante' of Gérard de Nerval, a large 8vo volume with more than forty engravings in black and in colors of "pièces uniques, inédites et rares."

On the 16th of May there was sold by auction at the Hôtel Drouot in Paris, for 5,500 francs, an autograph manuscript History of Corsica by the Emperor Napoleon I. It was written in 1790, during a leave of absence spent at Ajaccio. It consists of eight large folio pages of two columns each, in a very fine and compressed writing, making an account of considerable length. The manuscript contains many erasures, corrections, and changes, which add to its interest by enabling the reader to follow the youthful author in the composition of his work.

Apropos of the letter from Germany on another page, our readers may like to be reminded that any person can become a member of the Goethe Gesellschaft by sending ten marks to the treasurer, Dr. Moritz, at Weimar. For this sum annually renewed, they get the Jahrbuch and at least one publication—e. g., this year the interesting album described by our correspondent. Members are also privileged to buy the Goethe edition at reduced rates. Per contra, American members will be called upon to pay a little duty at the post-office, and this, as usual, will contribute to the public sentiment that will ultimately sweep away the barbarous tariff on books.

Mr. F. Gutekunst, Philadelphia, sends us a panel portrait of the late Richard Newton, D.D., of Philadelphia, that will commend itself to the friends of this well-known clergyman. It possesses the customary excellence of Mr. Gutekunst's photographic work.

The nineteenth annual session of the American Philological Association will be held at Burlington, Vermont, in the Marsh Room of the Billings Library of the University of Vermont, beginning Tuesday, July 12, 1887, at 3 o'clock P. M. Members intending to be present are requested to send their names to Prof. William H. Deering (Burlington, Vt.), Secretary of the Local Committee, as early as possible.

The Deerfield (Mass.) Summer School of History and Romance, begun experimentally in 1886, will attempt this year a permanent organization. Its lectures will open on July 16 with one by G. W. Cable on "Fiction as a Vehicle for Truth." Sessions will be held on Wednesdays and Saturdays, beginning July 13 and ending August 27. Address L. J. B. Lincoln, Deerfield.

—We find in the Revue Bleue for May 21 the most interesting and important announcement for students of French literature that has appeared for many years. Under the general title, 'Les Grands écrivains français,' the Paris house of Hachette is about to issue a series of studies upon the lives, the works, and the influence of the principal authors of France, by some of the first writers of the day. The selections of subjects and essayists in this "French Men of Letters" series are so felicitous that it would almost seem as if some one had amused himself by making out an ideal list. M. Ferdinand Brunetière is to write upon Boileau and Voltaire; M. Jules Lemaitre upon Alfred de Musset; M. Paul Bourget upon Balzac; M. Anatole France upon Racine; M. de Pomairols upon Lamartine; M. E. M. de Vogüé upon Joseph de Maistre. These are subjects to bring out all the best qualities of the writers, who are in every case especially sympathetic with the author of whom they will treat, and to show at the same time the delicacy and the depth of their critical appreciations. The volume on Montesquieu is to be by the historian of the French Revolution, M. Albert Sorel; that on Guizot by M. G. Monod of the Revue Historique and the Revue Critique; that on Agrippa d'Aubigné by M. Guillaume Guizot; Turgot by M. Léon Say; Victor Cousin by M. Jules Simon; and what a delightful volume he will make of it every one must know who has read his articles upon Cousin in the Journal des Débats for the last year or two. Other philosophical writers who will contribute to the series are M. Ernest Havet, who will write on Pascal, his special subject; M. Gaston Boissier on Mme. de Sévigné; M. E. Caro, who has already published at least one interesting article on the same subject, on George Sand.

—One of the most brilliant numbers of the series will be the Rousseau of M. Victor Cherbuliez, whose few slight external similarities of position would not seem to counterbalance his profound mental and moral unlikeness to his famous compatriot. The subject, however, lends itself readily to the malicious gayety of the usual manner of M. Cherbuliez, and his volume will certainly be a novel and interesting treatment of the author of the 'Contrat Social.' Again, the gratitude of all who are interested in French literature is due to the house of Hachette for inducing M. Taine to lay aside his historical work long enough to produce the volume promised from him on Sainte-Beuve, which will be awaited with more eager expectation by many than any other in the long list announced. The Villon of M. Gaston Paris is also an unexpected pleasure, although he has been busied with the poet for some time and has recently been lecturing upon the subject. He so seldom steps aside from the paths of pure erudition that such a work as this will be doubly welcome. Only once before, in the volume of short essays collected under the title 'La poésie du moyen âge' (noticed in the Nation for June 18, 1885), has he published anything specially addressed to the general reader. The little notice in the Revue Bleue speaks of the works we have mentioned as "actually in press or almost completed," and this is only the beginning of the series.

—All Shaksperians are glad to hear of a new booklet, however small, by Halliwell-Phillipps. His last issue, "for private circulation and presents only," seems to have been called forth by the strange discovery of Shakspere's title-deeds "in a family mansion near Shrewsbury." Accident having unearthed these papers, that had been given up for lost, Mr. Phillipps's faith redoubled that other unexpected finds concerning the personality of Shakspere would reward research in unexplored recesses, and especially in places visited by the itinerant theatrical company of which it is known that Shakspere was for twenty years a member. Napoleon and his staff, fording an arm of the Red Sea after dark, got beyond their depth. They might have perished had not their chief, halting his own horse, ordered his officers to swim theirs in lines radiating in every direction from him as a centre. Of course some of them soon struck land. Mr. Phillipps has for twenty years made thorough search through a radius of forty miles around Stratford, but now calls for co-workers to do likewise in fresh fields and pastures new beyond that limit. As a guide to those who shall undertake such a labor of love, he has published 'Shakspere's Tours,' or the visits of the company of actors to which it is certain that he belonged for twenty years, to the provincial cities and towns of England. The places thus visited were fifteen, and the number of visits no less than thirty-five. The date of each visit, the sums presented to the players by the local magistrates, and various other particulars, are given in extracts from corporate records. In research concerning English theatrical itineracy, Mr. Phillipps discovers that dramatic entertainments were prevalent during Shakspere's youth to such a degree as would naturally develop his dramatic genius. Sir Thomas Lucy is commonly thought to have been only an unconscious patron of the drama, and that through his driving Shakspere as a suspected poacher to take refuge in London. But, as Mr. Phillipps has shown, he had been patron of a body of itinerant actors who went by the name of "Sir Thomas Lucy's players," before Shakspere was twenty years old. Mr. Phillipps rejoices in having just come across a legal document in Worcestershire which appears to throw a side light on Shakspere's ancestry, and says that 30,000 documents in the Probate Court there still demand examination. As actors were always getting into trouble with local authorities, there is room to hope the investigators on the lines Mr. Phillipps points out may light upon a deposition attested by Shakspere himself—nay, why not some rencontre of the poet with the original Dogberry? Mr. Phillipps has the more reason for such hopes since the indisputable evidence he has gained that Will Squele of Cotswold and Stephen Sly of Stratford-on-Avon were veritable contemporaries and neighbors of the great dramatist.

—The remarkable portrait of Count Tolstoi which is the frontispiece of the June Century, bears the look of the religious dreamer to a degree that makes it seem less satisfactory, in point of naturalness, than those which have already made his features familiar to his readers here. It illustrates a very interesting account of a visit to him by George Kennan, who went on the humorously incongruous errand of carrying Nihilistic literature to the prophet of non-resistance, with a view to engage him in the cause. The article is much broader in scope than a mere sketch of Tolstoi's surroundings and personality, and sets him against the whole Russian background of suppressed revolution, the peasant-nature, the Church, and other great elements of society there, so effectively as to make his position more intelligible in its practical relations. Mr. Kennan writes from the point of view of a hard-headed American, who is interested by the audacity of Tolstoi's convictions, and nonplussed by the simplicity with which he accepts impossible conclusions; but he succeeds in giving a life-like impression of the man and something of his spirit. Tolstoi told the incident of his trying to intercede with the Czar for the prisoners who killed his father—an act which, perhaps, exhibits his character more strikingly than any other; but the Procureur refused to deliver his letter, in a reply which Tolstoi called "terrible." It is worth noting that on the subject of Darwinism he remarked that he was not well informed, but he had been told "that a Russian scientist named Danilefski has written a book which will completely demolish the Darwinian theory." Mr. Kennan dropped the topic. In the second paper of Prof. Atwater upon the Food Question he takes occasion to explode the error that fish is distinctively brain-food because of its proportion of phosphorus, though on other accounts he recommends it to sedentary persons. Mr. Munger contributes a readable reactionary article on Education, thickly studded with half-truths.

—The Saturday Review, noting that last year Carl Rosa did not produce a single opera of Wagner's, not even "Lohengrin," which he has just revived with so much success, adds that "even in Germany the only operas of Wagner which still seem to interest the public are 'Lohengrin,' the 'Walkyrie,' and 'Tristan und Isolde.'" On what preposterous ignorance, if not deliberate desire to misinform the reader, this statement is based, may be interred by referring to the statistical tables printed in Kürschner's 'Richard Wagner Jahrbuch,' pages 460-465. It is there shown that in twenty-eight German towns and cities, during 1885, "Rienzi" had 24 performances, the "Flying Dutchman" 73, "Tannhäuser" 109, "Lohengrin" 123, "Tristan" 25, "Meistersinger" 48, "Rheingold" 22, "Walküre" 71, "Siegfried" 19, "Götterdämmerung" 10. No other composer reached a figure as high as "Lohengrin" and "Tannhäuser." Bizet comes next with 105 for "Carmen." Then come Beethoven's "Fidelio," 94; Verdi's "Trovatore," 92; Weber's "Freischütz," 88; Meyerbeer's "Huguenots," 82; Flotow's "Martha," 72; Mozart's "Don Juan," 71; Rossini's "Barber," 68, etc. Nessler's "Trompeter von Säkkingen," which had 300 performances, is omitted from this list because it is a work of the flimsiest kind, which owes its vogue entirely to the popularity of the poem on which it is based, and which, there is not the least risk in predicting, will have entirely disappeared from the repertory in five years.

—The Gazette Anecdotique, Littéraire, Artistique et Bibliographique (Paris, Librairie des Bibliophiles; New York: Duprat & Co.) is far from being as well known here as it deserves to be, although it is now in its twelfth year. It is a little mine of information for matters literary, theatrical, and artistic in France. It is especially what the first adjective in its title indicates, anecdotical, with no long criticisms of books, etc., but with much chit-chat about authors, artists, and others and their latest productions. That it is under the direction of M. G. D'Heylli is a sufficient guarantee for the taste displayed in what may be called personal revelations. The Gazette is published with the concours of prominent men of letters, fourteen of whose names are given in the title-page with an etc. To convey a correct idea of the publication it must be added that there are in it a couple of pages, headed "Les mots de la quinzaine," filled with a selection of the brightest, if not always the most proper, clever sayings culled from such papers as the Gil Blas, the Événement, and others not specially noted for their prudery. These pages are entirely different from the rest of the magazine, which really contains many of the most interesting items of a light literary character that could be learned only by reading a great number of daily papers. The Gazette Anecdotique is printed with a great deal of taste, as are all Jouaust's publications. There are two numbers a month, each of thirty-two pages, very small octavo. From the issue of April 30 we learn that the "Mme. X.——" to whom so many love letters are addressed in Flaubert's correspondence, of which the first volume was noticed in the Nation, was no other than Mme. Louise Colet. The letters were written in the years 1846 and '47, she being then thirty-six years of age and he twenty-five. This lady acquired a rather unenviable notoriety through the attacks of Alphonse Karr, Barbey d'Aurevilly, and others, and in 1859 she published her novel entitled 'Lui,' thereby playing her part in the George Sand-Musset controversy called up by the publication of 'Elle et Lui.' It seems that about twelve years ago Flaubert was informed that Mme. Colet was about to publish the whole correspondence that had been exchanged between him and his "tenth muse." Terrified by this prospect, he immediately sent to the editor, Dentu, to put a stop to the publication. What his posthumous feelings would be at the present bringing to light of his not very interesting effusions of tenderness, we may imagine from a fragment of an unedited letter, dated 1877, quoted by the Gazette: "Du Camp and I," he writes to a friend, "have just burned all our letters, not wishing for anything in the world that they should be published after our death."

—Adolphe Racot, the novelist and brilliant writer for the Paris press, died about the middle of May in the hospital of Sainte-Anne, where he had been taken two weeks before, suffering under a sudden acute attack of mania. He was only forty-six years old, and in the midst of the most active literary labors. As a journalist he was best known by his long connection, beginning in 1875, with the Gazette de France, for which, under the signature of "Dancourt," he wrote the "Courrier de Paris," and, later, the weekly dramatic feuilleton. He was also connected with the Figaro for almost ten years, and with various other newspapers and periodicals. Readers of Le Livre will remember his very interesting articles upon Buloz, Gustave Planche, etc. He was for a long time one of the collaborateurs of the 'Grand dictionnaire universel du XIXe siècle,' of Larousse, for which he wrote literary, historical, and archæological articles. Racot was one of the earliest French writers to show the influence of the Russian novelists, in a powerful book which appeared in 1885, 'Le Crime de Darius Fal.' Since then he has published two other excellent novels, one of which, 'La Brèche aux loups' (Paris: Librairie Moderne; Boston: Schoenhof), received from the Académie Française, May 17, at the last distribution of the fund for the Montyon prizes for literary works "utiles aux mœurs," the highest prize given to works of fiction at the distribution of this year, 1,500 francs. The other, published at the beginning of the year, 'Le Capitaine muet' (Paris: Jules Lévy; Boston: Schoenhof), is a very successful attempt to revive the historical romance of adventure of Alexander Dumas. In this the scene is laid in the time of Charles IX., and the House of Guise is opposed to that of Valois in France, Flemings to Spaniards in Flanders, and Protestants to Catholics throughout the story, with a brilliancy and unexpectedness worthy of the great Alexander.

MORE SCHUMANN LETTERS.

Robert Schumann's Briefe. Neue Folge. Herausgegeben von F. G. Jansen. Leipzig: Breitkopf & Härtel.

THIRTY years having elapsed since the death of Schumann, the copyright on his compositions has expired, and the market has in consequence been flooded with cheap editions of his works—a circumstance which cannot but exert a most wholesome and quickening effect on the progress of musical culture. The best edition is still that of the original publishers of most of Schumann's works—Breitkopf & Härtel—since it has the benefit of a careful revision by the composer's widow and other famous musicians. The same publishers a year ago issued a collection of Schumann's letters, covering the period from 1827 to 1840, of which a second edition has already been called for; and this favorable reception has promoted the publication of a new series, extending to 1854, two years before Schumann's sad death in the lunatic asylum near Bonn. The present collection includes a considerable number of business letters to his several publishers. In one of these he confides to Dr. Härtel his plan of collecting and revising his musical criticisms, and publishing them in two volumes. But as this letter was, a few months later, followed by a similar one addressed to the publisher Wigand, who subsequently printed the essays, it is to be inferred that Breitkopf & Härtel, though assured of the future of Schumann's compositions, doubted the financial value of his musical essays—an attitude pardonable at a time when there was still a ludicrous popular prejudice against literary utterances by a musician. In 1883, however, after Wigand had issued a third edition of the 'Collected Writings on Music and Musicians' (which have also been translated into English by Mrs. Ritter), Breitkopf & Härtel atoned for their error by purchasing the copyright.

Schumann's letters to his publishers show that he used to suggest his own terms, which were commonly acceded to without protest. For his famous quintet he asked twenty louis d'or, or about $100; for "Paradise and the Peri," $500; the piano concerto, $125; Liederalbum, op. 79, $200; "Manfred," $250. He frequently emphasizes his desire to have his compositions printed in an attractive style, and in 1839 writes to Härtel that he cannot describe his pleasure on receiving the "Scenes of Childhood": "It is the most charming specimen of musical typography I have ever seen." The few misprints he discovers in it he frankly attributes to his MS. In a letter to his friend Rosen he writes that "it must be a deucedly comic pleasure to read my Sanskrit." But his musical handwriting appears to have been nearer to Sanskrit than his epistolary, if we may judge by the specimen facsimiles printed in Naumann's 'History of Music.'

The promptness with which all the leading music publishers of Germany have issued complete editions of Schumann's vocal and pianoforte compositions, shows how profitable they must be. But during his lifetime it was quite otherwise, and in a letter to Kossmaly he adduces the following four reasons for this state of affairs: "(1) inherent difficulties of form and contents; (2) because, not being a virtuoso, I cannot perform them in public; (3) because I am the editor of my musical paper, in which I could not allude to them; (4) because Fink is editor of the other paper, and would not allude to them." Elsewhere he remarks, concerning this rival editor: "It is really most contemptible on Fink's part not to have mentioned a single one of my pianoforte compositions in nine [seven] years, although they are always of such a character that it is impossible to overlook them. It is not for my name's sake that I am annoyed, but because I know what the future course of music is to be." It was in behalf of this tendency that he toiled on his paper, which at first barely paid its expenses, having only 500 subscribers several years after its foundation. And he not only avoided puffing his own compositions, but even inserted a contribution by his friend Kossmaly in which he was placed in the second rank of vocal composers! Yet, though he printed the article, he complains about it in a private letter: "In your article on the Lied, I was a little grieved that you placed me in the second class. I do not lay claim to the first; but I think I have a claim to a place of my own, and least of all do I wish to see myself associated with Reissiger, Curschmann, etc. I know that my aims, my resources, are far beyond theirs, and I hope you will concede this and not accuse me of vanity, which is far from me."

Many of the letters in the present collection are concerned with the affairs of Schumann's paper, the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, detailing his plans for removing it to a larger city than Leipzig, and the atrocious red-tape difficulties and delays he was subjected to when he finally did transfer it to Vienna. Although the paper was exclusively devoted to music, the Censur apparently took three or four months to make up its mind whether the state was in danger or not from the immigration of a new musical periodical. The editor confesses that he did not find as much sympathy as he had expected in Vienna; yet the city—as he writes some years later at Düsseldorf—"continues to attract one, as if the spirits of the departed great masters were still visible, and as if it were the real musical home of Germany." "Eating and drinking here are incomparable. You would be delighted with the Opera. Such singers and such an ensemble we do not have." "The admirable Opera is a great treat for me, especially the chorus and orchestra. Of such things we have no conception in Leipzig. The ballet would also amuse you." "A more encouraging public it would be difficult to find anywhere; it is really too encouraging—in the theatre one hears more applause than music. It is very merry, but it annoys me occasionally." "But I assure you confidentially that long and alone I should not care to live here; serious men and affairs are here in little demand and little appreciated. A compensation for this is found in the beautiful surroundings. Yesterday I was in the cemetery where Beethoven and Schubert are buried. Just think what I found on Beethoven's grave: a pen, and, what is more, a steel pen. It was a happy omen for me, and I shall preserve it religiously." On Schubert's grave he found nothing, but in the city he found Schubert's brother, a poor man with eight children and no possessions but a number of his brother's manuscripts, including "a few operas, four great masses, four or five symphonies, and many other things." He immediately wrote to Breitkopf & Härtel to make arrangements for their publication.

It is anything but complimentary to the discernment of the Viennese publishers and musicians of that period that, eleven years after Schubert's death, another composer had to come from Leipzig and give to the world the works of a colleague who not only had genius of the purest water, but the gift of giving utterance to his musical ideas in a clear style, intelligible to the public. Schubert died in 1828, and in 1842 Schumann could still write to one of his contributors: "It is time, it seems to me, that some one should write something weighty in behalf of Schubert; doesn't this tempt you? True, his larger works are not yet in print. But his vocal and pianoforte compositions suffice for an approximate portrait. Consider the matter. Do you know his symphony in C? A delightful composition, somewhat long, but extraordinarily animated, in character entirely new." To a Belgian friend who intended to write an article on the new tendencies in pianoforte music, he wrote: "Of older composers who have influenced modern music I must name above all Franz Schubert. . . . Schubert's songs are well known, but his pianoforte compositions (especially those for four hands) I rate at least equally high."

Of the numerous criticisms of well-known composers contained in this correspondence, a few more may be cited. They are mostly favorable in tone, but concerning the "Prophète" he writes: "The music appears to me very poor; I cannot find words to express my aversion to it." "Lortzing's operas meet with success—to me almost incomprehensible." To Carl Reinecke he writes that he is "no friend of song-transcriptions (for piano), and of Liszt's some are a real abomination to me." He commends Reinecke's efforts in this direction because they are free from pepper and sauce à la Liszt. Nevertheless, those of Liszt's song-transcriptions in which he did not indulge in too much bravura ornamentation are models of musical translation, and the collection of forty-two songs published by Breitkopf & Härtel should be in every pianist's library. "Of Chopin," he writes in 1836, "I have a new ballad [G minor]. It seems to me to be his most enchanting (though not most genial) work; I told him, too, that I liked it best of all his compositions. After a long pause and reflection he said: 'I am glad you think so, it is also my favorite.' He also played for me a number of new études, nocturnes, mazurkas—everything in an incomparable style. It is touching to see him at the piano. You would be very fond of him. Yet Clara is more of a virtuoso, and gives almost more significance to his compositions than he does himself."

Brendel having sent him some of Palestrina's music, he writes that "it really sounds sometimes like music of the spheres—and what art at the same time! I am convinced he is the greatest musical genius Italy has produced." Nineteen years previous to this he had written from Brescia: "Were not the Italian language itself a kind of eternal music (the Count aptly called it a long-drawn-out A-minor chord), I should not hear anything rational. Of the ardor with which they play, you can form no more conception than of their slovenliness and lack of elegance and precision." Handel appears to be mentioned only once in all of Schumann's correspondence ("I consider 'Israel in Egypt' the ideal of a choral work"); but Bach is always on his tongue. The following is one of the profoundest criticisms ever written: "Mozart and Haydn knew of Bach only a few pages and passages, and the effect which Bach, if they had known him in all his greatness, would have had on them, is incalculable. The harmonic depth, the poetic and humorous qualities of modern music have their source chiefly in Bach: Mendelssohn, Bennett, Chopin, Hiller, all the so-called Romanticists (I mean those of the German school) approximate in their music much closer to Bach than to Mozart."

To Wagner there are several references, betraying a most remarkable struggle between critical honesty and professional jealousy. Thus, in 1845, Schumann writes to Mendelssohn of "Tannhäuser":

"Wagner has just finished a new opera—no doubt, a clever fellow, full of eccentric notions, and bold beyond measure. The aristocracy is still in raptures over him on account of his 'Rienzi,' but in reality he cannot conceive or write four consecutive bars of good or even correct music. What all these composers lack is the art of writing pure harmonies and four-part choruses. The music is not a straw better than that of 'Rienzi,' rather weaker, more artificial! But if I should write this I should be accused of envy, hence I say it only to you, as I am aware that you have known all this a long time."

But in another letter to Mendelssohn, written three weeks later, he recants:

"I must take back much of what I wrote regarding 'Tannhäuser,' after reading the score; on the stage the effect is quite different. I was deeply moved by many parts."

And to Heinrich Dorn he writes a few weeks after this:

"I wish you could see Wagner's 'Tannhäuser.' It contains profound and original ideas, and is a hundred times better than his previous operas, though some of the music is trivial. In a word, he may become of great importance to the stage, and, so far as I know him, he has the requisite courage. The technical part, the instrumentation, I find excellent, incomparably more masterly than formerly."

Nevertheless, seven years later still, he once more returns to the attack, and declares that Wagner's music, "apart from the performance, is simply amateurish, void of contents, and disagreeable; and it is a sad proof of corrupt taste that, in the face of the many dramatic master-works which Germany has produced, some persons have the presumption to belittle these in favor of Wagner's. Yet enough of this. The future will pronounce judgment in this matter, too." Poor Schumann! His own opera, "Genoveva," was a failure, while "Tannhäuser" and "Lohengrin" were everywhere received with enthusiasm. This was a quarter of a century ago; and the future has judged.

What caused the failure of Schumann's only opera was not a lack of dramatic genius, but of theatrical instinct. He believed that in "Genoveva" "every bar is thoroughly dramatic"; and so it is, as might have been expected of the composer of such an intensely emotional and passionate song as "Ich grolle nicht" and many others. But Schubert, too, could write such thrilling five-minute dramas as the "Erlking" and the "Doppelgänger" without being able to compose a successful opera. Like Schumann, he could not paint al fresco, could not command that bolder and broader sweep which is required of an operatic composer. It is characteristic of Schumann that he did not write an opera till late in life, whereas born operatic composers have commonly begun their career with their specialty.* Indeed, it was only ten years before he composed his opera that Schumann wrote to a friend: "You ought to write more for the voice. Or are you, perhaps, like myself, who have all my life placed vocal music below instrumental, and never considered it a great art? But don't speak to any one about this." Oddly enough, less than a year after this he writes to another friend: "At present I write only vocal pieces. . . . I can hardly tell you what a delight it is to write for the voice as compared with instruments, and how it throbs and rages within me when I am at work. Entirely new things have been revealed to me, and I am thinking of writing an opera, which, however, will not be possible until I have entirely freed myself from editorial work."

Like other vocal composers, Schumann suffered much from the lack of suitable texts. In one letter he suggests that Lenau might perhaps be induced to write a few poems for composers, to be printed in the Zeitschrift: "the composers are thirsting for texts." In several other letters we become familiar with some of his plans which were never executed, owing, apparently, to the shortcomings of the librettists. One of these was R. Pohl, who in all seriousness sent Schumann a serious text in which the moon was introduced as one of the vocalists! Schumann mildly remonstrated that "to conceive of the moon as a person, especially as singing, would be too risky." So the project of "Ritter Mond" was abandoned, and it is to be regretted that Schumann did not reject his "Genoveva" libretto, which was largely responsible for the failure of the opera. In general he realized fully the immense importance of having a good text, not only for its intrinsic beauty, but because of its inspiring effect on the composer's creative powers. Thus he writes in regard to his "Faust": "The general impression it made seemed to me a good one, and surpassing that of the 'Peri,' presumably in consequence of the superior grandeur of the poem, which roused me, too, to a greater exertion of my strength."

One project of Schumann's is mentioned which it is to be very much regretted he never carried out. "I am at present [1840] preparing an essay on Shakspere's relations to music, his utterances and views, the manner in which he introduces music in his dramas, etc., etc.—an exceedingly fertile and attractive theme, the execution of which would, it is true, require some time, as I should have to read the whole of Shakspere's works for this purpose." His object was to send this to Jena as a dissertation for a Doctor's degree, with which he hoped to soften the heart of the obdurate Wieck, who opposed his marriage with Clara, and at the same time to make an impression on the public. Schumann had had painful experience of the fact that for genius itself there is little recognition in Germany unless it has a handle to its name—a "von" or a "Herr Doctor." Clara, however, loved him for his genius, and for the impassioned pieces and songs he wrote to express his admiration of her and of woman in general; and, like other German men of genius, he had his reward—after death. "No tone poet," says Naumann, "has been more enthusiastic in the praise of woman than Robert Schumann; he was a second Frauenlob. This was acknowledged by the maidens of Bonn, who, at his interment, filled the cemetery, and crowned his tomb with innumerable garlands."

RECENT LAW BOOKS.

AMERICAN readers will welcome the translation of Dr. von Holst's 'Constitutional Law of the United States of America' (Chicago: Callaghan & Co.). The author apologizes for consenting to its appearance in this country. It is, he says, but a sketch, written as part of a larger book for German readers—Marquardsen's 'Handbuch des Oeffentlichen Rechts.' He was limited, moreover, to a very inadequate space, and had to compress his material unduly, and wholly to throw out much; and "my only literary resources were my private library and the notes previously taken in the British Museum and American libraries." These explanations are, indeed, helpful in getting at the right point of view for judging of the book. But the reader will, after all, wonder at the extent and accuracy of the writer's knowledge and the general justness of his observations. Three "Parts" on the "Genesis of the Constitution," "The Federal Constitution," and the "Constitutional and General Law of the Separate States," fill up the three hundred pages and more which compose the volume; the second part takes up more than two-thirds of the whole.

From a pretty careful examination of this volume we are inclined to think it one of the best brief accounts of our constitutional system that have been published. It has the sort of merit that is usually found in the comments of a competent foreign observer upon the institutions of any country. Things that attract little attention, and so are often not at all remarked or understood by those who live under a given system, strike a stranger with the charm of novelty; they are tacitly compared with other institutions, and their true character is often more keenly perceived and brought out by such observers than by any others. De Tocqueville's book, parts of Prof. Dicey on 'The Law of the Constitution,' and such a treatise as Cottu on the 'Administration of Criminal Justice in England,' are instances of this. Much of this sort of merit is found in this little book by Von Holst. An illustration of it may be seen in his striking note at pp. 136, 137, on the Indians. "The first cause of the failures and mistakes," he keenly remarks, and it is as true to-day as it ever was, "has been in no small degree the lack of knowledge of and care for the fundamental question of Law." It is a shrewd remark that "the constitutional law as to the obligation of contracts made by legislation is still in embryo, despite the numberless decisions upon it." The merits and the true bearing of the excellent proposal to bring the Cabinet officers on the floor of Congress are well recognized and stated. The limitations upon the power of courts, in judging of the constitutionality of legislation, are more keenly discerned by Von Holst than they are by some of our own writers. The fulness of the statistics in regard to various important topics is very satisfactory. We have observed but few errors; the author is not accurate in some of his statements about the legal-tender cases in the somewhat ill-judged note on p. 62. And it is a very misleading statement on p. 231 that "Unquestionably Congress can as little impair the obligation of contracts as a State." No court could declare a law of Congress unconstitutional merely upon the ground that it impaired the obligation of a contract. There is sometimes a certain vagueness and lack of confidence in our author's manner of discussing controverted questions, e. g., as regards the subject last mentioned, which is probably traceable to the circumstances under which his essay was composed.

Mr. Henry Campbell Black's 'Essay on the Constitutional Prohibitions against Legislation Impairing the Obligation of Contracts, and against Retroactive and Ex-post-facto Laws' (Little, Brown & Co.), is a small octavo of a little more than three hundred pages, containing a careful statement of the law on the topics named. It is a good and conscientious piece of work, and will be found useful in any examination of the difficult subjects of which it treats. The term "essay" is not particularly descriptive of the book. The author raises the hopes of his readers higher than the performance justifies when he says, "The historical method of treatment has been adopted wherever practicable." But perhaps he did not intend by this term to indicate the development of his subject by a consideration of the cases in the order of time. Mr. Black might, with advantage, impart to his discussions a little of that vigorous criticism of the judges which gave value to Pomeroy's books. He lets them off altogether too easily. But, with all drawbacks, it is a very good book.

Mr. Webster Elmes's 'Treatise on the Law of the Customs' (Little, Brown & Co.) is a book of a good deal of merit, and deals with a subject of much importance on which there is no recent treatise; indeed, the author hardly goes too far when he says that his book "enters upon a new field of legal exposition and is comparatively a pioneer undertaking," for, as he truly adds, "the work of Mr. Andrews, published over a quarter of a century ago, although a standard work at the time, dealt with the subject at a period when, unlike the present, the field of research was of limited extent." It can hardly be called a field of unlimited extent now; but the enormous growth of business during the last generation, and the influence of our barbarous customs legislation, have vastly swollen the volume of controversy and of litigation. Not merely lawyers, but merchants and importers, will find this careful treatise extremely useful.

Mr. Joel Prentiss Bishop's 'Commentaries on the Law of Contracts, upon a New and Condensed Method' (Chicago: T. H. Flood & Co.), is further described upon the title-page as "a new work, superseding the author's smaller one." Mr. Bishop's "Prefatory Explanations" are full of that racy, unconventional discourse about his own methods, principles, and successes with which the readers of his books are familiar. And all through the book, notwithstanding his prime doctrine of condensation, he finds time and room for a cheerful sort of preaching and comment like this: "On a just view of things, a judge would better serve the State, and more adorn his office, to go round with blacking and brush, 'shining' the boots of the officers of his court, than to sit on the bench enforcing a wager." The book is "addressed as well to readers wholly unacquainted with the law as to advanced students and lawyers." It states compactly, in 600 pages, with much more than ordinary ability, what the author conceives to be the result of the cases, with a certain amount of reasoning—what the author calls "the law's reasoning," as contrasted with any reasoning of his own. The citations are numerous, particularly from the American cases. The book, like the other writings of this author, shows signs of much conscientious labor; it is a convenient hand-book, and will be found helpful as a guide to the cases and as a summary presentation of current doctrines; but it will not, in our judgment, add to the deserved reputation of this highly valued writer. The subject of Contracts has been very thoroughly treated in recent years; no treatise upon the topic can now be satisfactory which does not indicate a more profound analysis and a fuller knowledge of the historical development of the subject than Mr. Bishop has brought to bear. Let any man, for instance, read the first nineteen cases in Prof. Langdell's book on Sales, and then turn to §1316 in this book, and he will see how much the genetic method (to use a phrase of the scientific men) might do for an author, and how little profit there is in such a statement as Mr. Bishop makes on the topic which those cases illustrate.

The eighth edition of Taylor's 'American Law of Landlord and Tenant' (Little, Brown & Co.) is prepared by Mr. Henry F. Buswell, already favorably known to the legal profession by his own original work, especially his treatise on Insanity. Mr. Buswell has added to the excellent work of the last editor, Mr. Joseph Willard, what was necessary to bring down the cases to the present time. He has also made a convenient change of a practical nature in prefixing "to each paragraph a brief statement of its subject-matter; and these lines are collected into analytical Tables of Contents prefixed to each volume of the work." About a thousand cases have been added. In point of form, the book presents an unusually attractive appearance.

The large constituency of people who are concerned in knowing all about the recent national statute in regard to railroads will find a very serviceable guide in Mr. J. C. Harper's 'Law of Inter-State Commerce, especially as applied to the Act to Regulate Commerce approved Feb. 4, 1887, with Notes and Decisions' (Cincinnati: Robert Clarke & Co.). The author describes it as, "for the most part, a collection of the statutes and decisions, both in this country and in Great Britain, which bear upon the questions arising out of this law. . . . Some of the most important provisions of this law, including sections 2, 3, 7, and 16 of the Act, and the provision for the Commission, have been, in essential particulars, imported from the English statutes which have been for many years in operation in England and the subject of constant adjudication by the English courts." The citations are very full, the cases being classified and arranged, with a brief statement of what they purport, after the different sections of the act. The book begins with a like annotation of a few clauses of the national Constitution, and ends with a brief appendix, containing the substance of the leading English statutes. The author apologizes for a certain haste in preparing his book; but it appears to be exactly what is needed at the present moment.

A collection of 'Arguments to Courts and Juries, 1846-1874, by William Johnston, formerly a Judge of the Superior Court of Cincinnati' (Cincinnati: Robert Clarke & Co.), furnishes interesting reading. There are ten of these arguments; and an address is added on "The Right of Secession," delivered in March, 1861. The volume will preserve the memory of an able and honored lawyer, who still lives at an advanced age. The first argument was delivered in Kentucky before a Circuit Court, in an extradition case, in 1846. A slave had been carried into Ohio in the course of business, by one who had hired him. By the law of Ohio he was thereby free; but the law of Kentucky still held him to be a slave. He was afterwards carried back to Kentucky. On returning to Ohio, he refused to go again to Kentucky. Thereupon two men, employed by the slave-owner, abducted him and returned him to his master. These men were indicted in Ohio for kidnapping a free colored person, and their extradition was demanded of the Governor of Kentucky. By a law of 1820 the State of Kentucky required its Governor in such circumstances to send the alleged fugitive from justice before a circuit judge, and if he should be of opinion that the fugitive was owner of the slave or acted by the owner's authority, it was his duty to discharge him from custody. Mr. Johnston argued that this law was unconstitutional. The Kentucky Judge, however, held, in an opinion which is preserved at p. 41, that "it must rest with the Executive to decide whether he will recognize these restrictions as binding on him." As he had so recognized them in this case, the Court deemed its office that of a mere "auxiliary to the Executive," and that its only duty was to ascertain whether the negro was an escaping slave, and whether the accused were duly identified and had acted by the owner's authority. The kidnappers were discharged. The reader is reminded of the well-known later case in which the position of these two States was reversed, and when Kentucky vainly endeavored to secure extradition from Ohio of a fugitive from justice, who was charged with assisting slaves to escape—the case of Kentucky v. Dennison, 24 How. 6.

In an argument for Gov. Bebb, in Illinois, charged with manslaughter, there are preserved curious details of the rough practices of earlier times in our Western States when a neighbor was newly married—the charivari and the anirugian serenade, pp. 128-129. Here is a striking touch of the old frontier patriotism, in the speech on the "Right of Secession":

"It is over half a century since my venerable father threaded the gaps of the Allegheny Mountains and took up his abode in Ohio. I first found myself in a log cabin in the wilderness, where night was made hideous by the howling of the wolf, and the paths of the woods dangerous by the prowling of savage beasts. I have seen and felt all the poverty, privations, hardships, and toils of backwoods life, when shabby little pack-horses did the work of commerce now performed by canals, steamboats, and railroads. There were in those days no cities, no crowded marts, no splendid feats [sic] and shows to dazzle the vision of poor boys. We had but two wonderful things to gaze upon and admire—the SUN shining in the heavens above, and the FLAG OF THE UNION floating over our heads. As I grew older and more thoughtful, I still associated these wonders. I looked upon the sun and said: This is the lamp which God in his power has hung out to the universe. I looked upon the national banner and said: This is the beacon light which God in his providence has hung out to the struggling, bewildered, and faint-hearted votaries of freedom throughout the world."

Mr. Edmund P. Dole's 'Talks about Law' (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.) has for its main object "to give the non-professional reader, in a simple way, some idea of what law is and how it is administered, such general information . . . as all intelligent persons are expected to have in regard to other subjects." But the trouble is that the person for whom this book is meant will not read it; it is hopelessly dry. The book is an attractive one to look at; it has been prepared with a good deal of labor; and it appears to be accurate—certainly in the main. But of insight, of historical research, of any deep knowledge of the subject or skill in presenting it, there is small trace. A student of law might perhaps get something from it; but it would not quicken him.

'Outlines of International Law, with an Account of its Origin and Sources and of its Historical Development,' by Prof. George B. Davis of West Point (Harper & Bros.), is a book which has been prepared with excellent judgment, and is well calculated to interest and inform the class of readers for whom it was intended. "It has been my purpose," says the author, "to provide a work sufficiently elementary in character to be within the reach of students and others who may desire to gain some knowledge of the general principles of international law." The book is well and carefully written, and presents the subject and the development of it in a manner that will meet the requirements of the legal student and of the thoughtful general reader.

Haifa; or, Life in Modern Palestine. By Laurence Oliphant. Edited, with introduction, by Charles A. Dana. Harper & Bros. 1887.

MR. DANA'S introduction to Mr Oliphant's letters is very brief, being hardly more than a recommendation of them to the reader as the work of one whose judgment and accuracy may be entirely relied upon. As originally printed, they passed through Mr. Dana's hands, and at his urgency they have been brought together in a book. It would have been still better if their contents had been made into a book with some division of subject and order of arrangement. Whatever loss of freshness this would have entailed, would have been more than made good by the greater clearness of impression certain to result from such a method. As it is, the letters jump about from place to place in a somewhat bewildering manner. Moreover, Mr. Oliphant is betrayed by the fulness of his own knowledge into an under-estimate of his readers' ignorance. He does a good deal of "thinking under ground"—starts in the middle of a thing as abruptly as Robert Browning, allowing the reader to orient himself as best he can as he goes on. But the letters are of much greater value than any that could be written by a vacation tourist, however much on the alert. They are the outcome of a three-years' residence in Palestine, much of it in Haifa, a few miles east of the projecting point of Carmel, but including many journeys to and fro, much exploration, and an occasional stay of months in other places than Haifa, with a view to the most perfect possible assimilation of alien customs, manners, modes of thought and life.

The tone of the book is very different from that of books of Palestinian travel generally. Mr. Oliphant is not easily ecstatic. He is as little superlative as Mr. Emerson could ask. His temper is not that of Browning's traveller who > "saw the ark atop of Ararat,

> But did not climb there since 'twas getting dusk,
> And robber bands infest the mountain's foot."

Conventionally, if not profoundly, he accepts the New Testament record of events as historically true; but if the record is not consistent, his sense and not his sensibility helps him to a conclusion. For example: Matthew locates the story of the devil in the swine in the country of the Gergesenes; Mark and Luke, in the country of the Gadarenes. Of course there were two miracles, says the average apologist. But if there was one in the country of the Gadarenes, says Mr. Oliphant, the swine must have descended twelve hundred feet to the Yarumk, swum that river, clambered up the opposite bank, and then raced about six miles across the plain before they could reach the margin of the lake. Of course a herd of swine with the devil in them might do almost anything; but Mr. Oliphant inclines to the reading "Gergesenes," because it is exactly suited to their country in the vicinity of Kersa. The reader who goes to Mr. Oliphant's book for the charm of sentimental association will be grievously disappointed. In a cold, dry way, he indicates the connection of this or that place with New Testament persons and events; but he is never deeply moved, nor does he attempt to move his readers. His interest in Palestinian exploration is very great, but it is archæological, not emotional. The negative results of the explorers do not trouble him at all. He does not pretend to have done anything considerable himself in the way of archæological discovery. He has availed himself freely of the publications of the Palestine Exploration Fund Society of London, which are not accessible to the general reader. Not the least of his service is his popularizing these costly and elaborate publications.

The interest of Mr. Oliphant's letters is far less that of pious association or archæological discovery than that of social and political conditions existing at the present time. The modernness of the situation is the continual surprise. Mr. Oliphant finds that Palestine, in spite of many drawbacks, has attractions as a residence superior to those of any other country in which his lot has been cast. If the many colonists who are flocking there are of the same opinion, Daniel Deronda's scheme, in which George Eliot had a very real interest, may have been less chimerical than many of her readers thought it at the time. The colonizing tendency is at the front in the majority of Mr. Oliphant's letters. One of the most interesting and important of the colonial enterprises is that of the German Christian Adventists, followers of Prof. Christopher Hoffman of Würtemberg, who, after studying at Tüöingen, became a minister of the Lutheran Church, which he vainly endeavored to reform from the inside, and then broke away to set up the kingdom under his own personal supervision. The conjunction of fanatical piety with industrial prudence has often been observed. These German Adventists in Palestine afford a new example. Their principal obstacle has been the determination of the Government to prevent the legalization of their land titles if possible. This obstacle has at length been surmounted, and the colonies, four in number, the principal one at Haifa, are entering on a period of comparative prosperity, while the influence of their enterprising and industrious spirit on the surrounding Arab population is already evident. There are seven or eight colonies of Russian and Rumanian Jewish refugees. They are working hard against such odds as only the Turkish Government can oppose to any decent enterprise, but they do not make such good agriculturists as the Jews who are native to the country. The Haluka, i. e., the tax of all Jews outside of Palestine for the support of Palestinian Jews, is a greater obstacle, in Mr. Oliphant's opinion, than Government obstruction. It is simply a premium upon mendicancy. The agglomeration of different nationalities is remarkable. In some places there are eight or nine varieties living together with a good deal of mutual toleration. Mr. Oliphant is not nearly so pessimistic about the possibilities of progress in Palestine as many writers whose acquaintance with the matter is far less than his. Three common prejudices against Jewish settlement in Palestine he considers about equally unsound. They are that Jews cannot be agriculturists; that the country is infertile; and that it is unsafe. A railroad from Hauran, the grain district east of the Jordan, to Acre is likely to be built, surveys for it having been made. This will be a great industrial advantage. A more astonishing scheme for bringing Palestine into active relations with the outside world is that for a ship canal from the Red Sea to the Mediterranean, which, commencing at Haifa, should be cut through the plain of Esdraelon to the Valley of the Jordan, and connect the lower end of the Dead Sea with the Red Sea by a section debouching at Akaba. But this is not calculated to disturb M. de Lesseps's peace of mind.

Mr. Oliphant has several letters on the Druses, their characteristics, their beliefs, their festivals. There are three groups of them, one in Upper Galilee, one in the mountains of Lebanon, and one east of the Jordan. They furnish the Sultan with 25,000 of his best fighting men. They have some very trying ways, but were, on the whole, the best people to live with whom Mr. Oliphant found in Palestine, and he gave them a fair trial. There is some likelihood that the three groups will coalesce in the region east of the Jordan. Of the letters dealing with the archæological side of Palestine and its historical associations, that upon the Sea of Galilee in the time of Christ is one of the most interesting. Mr. Oliphant here urges the consideration, of which little is made by the average Christian tourist, that the most flourishing period of Jewish history was subsequent to the time of Christ. His style has seldom so much warmth and glow as where he endeavors to reconstruct for the imagination the shores of Genesareth as they appeared to Jesus. Of the two places which dispute the site of Capernaum he inclines to Tell Hum, the more southern of the two, which are only a few miles apart. A chapter on "Traditional Sites at Jerusalem" arrives at the conclusion that "the Holy City of the world, par excellence, contains within its walls more sacred shams and impostures than any other city in the world." It is impossible to avoid the feeling that the results of Palestinian exploration so far have been much more largely negative than positive. For those who like to be fooled there is no lack of holy places, but Mr. Oliphant's temper is indicated by his question when shown the stone on which Lazarus sat when the dog licked his sores—"Where is the dog?" Bethlehem, Bethany, the Mount of Olives—these can be identified; but there are two Gethsemanes in dispute between the Greek and Latin Churches; the rock-hewn tomb of Jesus is certainly not where it is commonly wept over, and the same is true of Calvary. Of the possible identification of the former, Mr. Oliphant is perhaps too easily persuaded. The site of the Temple has been determined, though not the area it covered. The Pool of Siloam has been successfully identified, and the course of the city walls prior to the siege of Titus is well agreed upon "except by those who are fatally affected by their religious sentiments." Much more has been done to identify places spoken of by Josephus than to identify those mentioned in the New Testament. It seems not unlikely that the tomb of Nicodemus, so called, is the tomb of the early Hebrew Kings, though here, again, Mr. Oliphant impresses us as too easily persuaded. But it is sufficiently certain that the tombs of the Kings are not where they are generally shown, on the hill of the upper city, where there are no ancient tombs at all.

Much of the most attractive part of Mr. Oliphant's letters is purely incidental, so that no idea of it can be got except by going to his book.

George Canning. By Frank H. Hill. [English Worthies Series.] D. Appleton & Co. 1887.

Of Canning most people know nothing except that he was an "English worthy." His name is familiar enough, but his achievements are only vaguely associated with his name. He is the author of one historic sentence, "I called the New World into existence to redress the balance of the Old"; and we apprehend that his best claim to enduring remembrance will be found in the results of the policy thus indicated. Nor is this remembrance altogether a grateful one. Canning's influence enabled the Spanish-American colonies to achieve their independence; but he seems to have cared little for that result. As he himself says, he was determined that if France conquered Spain, it should not be Spain with the Indies. The South American republics were tolerated, therefore, because it was not for the interest of England that they should be subject to a rival Power. The policy of Canning was beneficent, but he was not meritorious.

His part in the suppression of the slave trade was a more honorable one. It is true that, early in his Parliamentary career, he made a speech in which he said that if he were a negro he should prefer slavery in the West Indies to having his throat cut in Africa. But he was really in earnest in his efforts to induce the great Powers to unite in the suppression of this iniquitous traffic, and he procured at least a formal adhesion to his views at the Congress of Verona. The real obstacle was the greed of France. Four years later, at Paris, Canning urged upon the Bishop of Hermopolis (Minister of Worship) the desirability of obtaining a Papal bull against the slave trade. He gave the following account of his success: "When, after describing its anti-Christian character and all its horrors in practice (most eloquently, as I flattered myself), I ended by saying, 'And it is now with Catholic countries only that the shame and criminality of this monstrous traffic rests,' my convert (as I hoped to find him) answered, with the greatest mildness and simplicity, 'Apparemment ils en ont plus de besoin.'"

We may also attribute to Canning some share in the credit of freeing Greece from the barbarous oppression of the Turks, although the battle of Navarino was fought two months after his death. But here, as well as in the matters already referred to, we do not find Mr. Hill's treatment sufficiently thorough. If he had set before himself the definite object of explaining Canning's relation to these affairs, he would have left a more distinct impression upon his readers. As it is, we lose ourselves among details, and fail to get a satisfactory idea of the nature of Canning's influence. He clearly ranked with Pitt and Fox as an orator, but his oratory was that of an actor. As a public man he could not have been so generally disliked and distrusted as he was without good cause. He seems to have been his own worst enemy, to have been the victim of his own selfish ambition. Had he thought more of principle and less of himself, he might have won greater fame than that of Pitt; but his vanity blinded him to his opportunity, and the control of the destinies of his country passed into other hands. He was responsible for the destruction of the Danish fleet in the harbor of Copenhagen; but this brilliant exploit was almost upon a par with that proposed by Themistocles to Aristides, and characterized by the latter as equally advantageous and dishonorable.

So far as the internal history of England is concerned, it is hardly too much to say that Canning deserves to be remembered chiefly for his clever satirical verses. Mr. Hill gives some of these, which are of different degrees of merit. The chapter entitled "Attacks on Addington" contains many entertaining specimens. The "Friend of Humanity and the Knife-grinder"—which, by the way, is not mentioned here—is a good example of Canning's talent for this sort of work, and is of its kind a classic. Mr. Hill evidently understood that he had a very difficult task before him in writing this life, and he has not spared his labor. Nevertheless he does not seem to us to have mastered his subject. His style, however, is spirited, and it is convenient to have so readable a sketch of a man really little known.

A Philosophical Study: Grammar and Language. An attempt at the Introduction of Logic into Grammar. By Ed. L. Starck. Boston: W. B. Clarke & Carruth. 1887.

Mr. Starck is a self-taught linguist who describes himself as knowing seven languages so far as to be able to use them with understanding—six modern languages and Latin. He has been much troubled by the grammars. They do not agree about the number of the parts of speech, or the moods, and many other things. They are not profound enough. Mr. Starck wishes to ground them on more solid foundations. It would seem at first as though he could hardly hope to do it. He divides grammar into phonetic, morphology of words and of forms, construction, and syntax. As to "phonetic," he says, "I know nothing about it." He might say the same of "morphology" also, for he expressly disclaims all knowledge of philology. As to "construction" and "syntax," he is suffering from an embarrassment of riches. He says "the frequent occurrence of faulty constructions and of defective arrangements of words finds in my case an explanation in the handling of several languages at one time." His syntax, it seems, is "a kind of a mixtum compositum of several languages," due to the structure of his sensorium. In these conditions it is plain Mr. Starck could not make a grammar, since he knows nothing about some of the subjects treated in a grammar, and has only a hotchpot of the others. But a good head is better than a full one. Mr. Starck sees certain advantages in his position. "The fact that I do not possess any philological knowledge," he says, "and that the heavy weight of numberless volumes of phonetic facts and historical details does not keep my head down, enables me much better to survey the linguistic field before me and to discover its general lexicographical features." What he can do he is willing to do. He proposes to introduce philosophy and logic into grammar; not any particular system of philosophy or logic, apparently; there is no indication that he knows any. He thinks, most likely, that a man with a good head can think sagaciously and profoundly on any subject. Mixing brains with grammar seems to be what he means by introducing logic and philosophy into it. The book consists of four essays—on classification, the sentence, forms and inflections, the order of words. A large part of it is a statement of the facts which give rise to certain linguistic phenomena, and contains nothing new or specially striking. But the author thinks that he has struck an idea which will reduce grammar to a system. This idea is the Duality of Language. Language is partly subjective and partly objective. He calls the pronouns subjective nouns and subjective adjectives, the conjunctions subjective abbreviations; other words are objective. He talks about the subjective and objective in connection with moods, numerals, prepositions, the arrangement of words, and other topics, as philologists do. But no particular illumination comes from it. The whole working out is fragmentary and crude. It is a pity that he cannot endure philologists. He would have found the subjective and objective elements of the Indo-European speeches philosophically and logically set forth and expounded in their pages. But he rages at the thought of learning from philologists. He empties on them all the hard words of his seven languages, janotism, galimatias, and amphigouri, Sprach-Pfuscher, and Philologaster, all in a heap. It is good luck that he knows no Greek.

THE MEMOIRS
OF THE
MARGRAVINE of BAIREUTH.

Translated and Edited by

H.R.H. PRINCESS CHRISTIAN.

In 8vo, cloth, extra, $3.75.

The Margravine was the sister of Frederick the Great, and exerted great influence over his character. Her Diary is a wonderful narrative of the petty intrigues and gossip of the German Court.

The Volume will have as Frontispiece an Autotype Copy of the Portrait in Berlin.

 Princess Christian, during her recent stay in Berlin, devoted much time and attention to the completion of the English edition of the Memoirs of Wilhelmine, Margravine of Baireuth, sister of Frederick the Great, which the Princess intends to bring out in London a few weeks hence. The Princess has for this edition written a special introduction, explaining in a very interesting manner the main features of the general situation in Europe, and especially in Germany, at that time. In order to prepare herself for this task the Princess has made a diligent study of the original manuscripts in the Berlin Royal Library, the documents being placed at her disposal by the Crown Prince's special request. In the course of her studies the Princess discovered an excellent portrait of the Margravine by Pesne; and this, in the form of a beautifully executed autotype, is to stand as the frontispiece of the book.

Judith:

A CHRONICLE OF OLD VIRGINIA. By MARION HARLAND. New Edition. Cloth, $1.00; paper, 50 cents.

"The elements which in Mrs. Terhune's stories have been at once popularizing and influential, we see most strikingly in 'Judith,' the latest and artistically the most perfect, perhaps, of her novels. Fiction has afforded no more charming glimpses of Old Virginia life than are found in this delightful story, with its quaint pictures, its admirably drawn characters, its wit, and its frankness."—The Brooklyn Times.

Around the World on a Bicycle.

From San Francisco to Teheran. By THOMAS STEVENS. With an Introduction by T. W. HIGGINSON. Colored Frontispiece—Portrait of the Author—and over 100 other Illustrations. 8vo, $4.00.

The great interest which has developed in the last few years in the exhilarating sport of wheeling, makes fresh and timely this record of Mr. Stevens's extraordinary journey. In every way his achievement was a remarkable one; and he has told the story of it in a style that will delight all who admire pluck, skill, and endurance, brought out under novel conditions and amid picturesque scenes in remote lands.

"For the originality of its idea, the physical endurance and pluck necessary for its execution, the dangers involved in it, and its own inherent interest, this bicycle trip round the world will pretty certainly remain unequalled in our time."—The Pall Mall Gazette.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JUNE 16, 1887.

The Week.

THERE are indications here and there that the high-tariff men of the North and the "Moonshiners" of the South intend to make common cause to repeal the whiskey tax at the next session of Congress. Mr. Randall and Judge Kelley are at one on this point. They have frequently advocated the sweeping away of the whole internal-revenue system as a "relic of the war." This is the only fiscal relic of the war that they care to get rid of. Most of us remember how the tariff was raised a second time to compensate the manufacturers for the internal-revenue tax on their goods, and how, when this tax was repealed, the tariff was not lowered correspondingly or lowered at all. "Relic of the war" is a very taking phrase just now. It is quite the fashion to bury our animosities. Even Senator Sherman performed this ceremony at Nashville a few weeks ago with much solemnity. It is true that he attempted to dig them up again at Springfield, but he did not succeed in giving them any lively appearance or attractive guise. But with all the prevailing enthusiasm for burying relics of the war, we hear of no movement to bury the war tariff, or none later than 1883, when the Hayes-Oliver Commission, on page 6 of their report, said: "It would seem that the rate of duties under the existing tariff, fixed for the most part during the war, under the evident necessity at that time of stimulating to its utmost extent all domestic production, might be adapted, through reduction, to the present condition of peace, requiring no such extraordinary stimulus."

The internal-revenue taxes still remaining are those on distilled spirits, fermented liquors, tobacco, and bank notes, amounting to about $119,000,000, as follows:

On distilled spirits	$69,000,000
Fermented liquors	19,700,000
Tobacco and cigars	28,000,000
Bank circulation	2,000,000
Total	$118,700,000

It is pretty certain that the tobacco tax will be repealed at the next session of Congress. Although the remission of that tax must be considered unscientific while so many other taxes in the form of customs duties on the necessaries of life remain, this is, perhaps, the only article yielding a large sum that can be untaxed without a long and angry dispute. The most obvious need of the times is to get rid of the Treasury surplus. More pressing, indeed, is this than any conceivable theory of finance, since the existence of the surplus is a menace to the very integrity of the Government. It breeds every species of demoralization. It takes the very word economy out of the dictionary of politics. What is the use of an economical Government if it results in locking up the people's money in the Treasury vaults? Without some adequate reduction of taxes, we may look for a campaign in which rival candidates and opposing parties will boast on the stump of the magnitude of the appropriations they have made, and lay claim to popular support on the ground that they have squandered larger sums than their adversaries ever dreamed of. There is something remarkably suggestive of this in Senator Sherman's Springfield speech.

Now that William E. Chandler is universally recognized by the Republican party press as a trusted leader, and has been elected to the United States Senate, it may be well to call his attention to the fact that he has neglected to reply to a disagreeable reflection upon his party loyalty which Mr. B. F. Jones, Chairman of the National Republican Committee, made in December last. There was a controversy between the two leaders at that time. Mr. Jones began it by charging that President Arthur and his Cabinet had shown a want of fidelity and zeal in behalf of Blaine in 1884. Mr. Chandler responded, declaring the charge "baseless." Mr. Jones renewed the charge, saying of Mr. Chandler:

> "I have no taste for, nor do I see any present occasion for, a discussion as to political methods with one whose plans and proposals, during the brief intercourse I had with him in the campaign of 1884, were not such as to commend him to those having the success of the Republican party at heart. His criticisms at that time of men most prominent in the party do not seem to me quite consistent with his present expressions of regret in regard to bad feeling between public men. I would not like to feel called upon to make public the facts upon which my opinion of Mr. Chandler is based."

Mr. Chandler has never responded to the unpleasant insinuation of this closing sentence; but now that he is placed in the front rank of his party as a "leader," we think he ought to. So long as he fails to call for the facts which Mr. Jones says he should not like to feel called upon to make public, there will remain doubts about his loyalty which will impair his influence.

A curious illustration of the conflict always liable to arise between Federal and State authority is presented in Maine. Not merely the laws but the Constitution of that State absolutely prohibits the sale of liquors. But the Constitution of the United States Senate confers upon Congress the sole power to "lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises," with the provision that "all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States"; and the Supreme Court decided long ago that under this section no State can interfere with the sale of an imported article protected by the national seal, except by consent of Congress. It has been held that such goods must be sold in the original unbroken packages in order to avoid liability to interference by the State, but when so sold it matters not if they be expressly declared contraband by the laws of the State. For years a firm of liquor dealers in Portland has been openly importing and selling liquor in this way, and recently Michael Burns, "a well-known liquor-dealer of Augusta," who closed his shop as a retailer of drinks by the glass last March, has resumed business as a seller of foreign-distilled liquors in packages to suit all tastes. "The retail price of the goods has been made so low as to be in easy reach of the purchasing public, and the sales have already been very large." There are doubtless a good many temperance people in Maine who would like to see a Supreme Court so thoroughly dominated by "the States-rights dogma" that it would declare this practice illegal, since there is no prospect that either the Republican Senate or the Democratic House will feel disposed to pass any act offensive to the liquor-dealers on the verge of a Presidential election.

The Dependent Pension Bill which has been prepared by the National Pension Committee of the Grand Army, appears to be about the same sort of thing as the one which Mr. Cleveland vetoed last winter. Its corner-stone is the proposition on which the vetoed one was based, that anybody who served in the Union Army for three months during the civil war, and who now claims that he cannot earn a living, shall receive $12 a month for the rest of his days; and that proposition is as unsound now as it was four months ago. The scheme is to be submitted to all the posts, with the evident hope on the part of prominent Grand Army politicians of the Gen. Tuttle stamp that a majority will endorse it, and so threaten Mr. Cleveland with the loss of "the soldier vote" if he vetoes it.

The State, of Richmond, accuses us of unfairness in our article, "Failure to Compromise in Virginia," says we have forgotten the history of the Commonwealth for the last eight years, and thinks we do no justice to the Democrats who wished to pay the debt. When we first began to write upon the subject of the Virginia debt, we gave full honor to the non-repudiating portion of the Democratic party, and we still think they fought a good fight against Mahoneism. But when the Democratic party gave up the struggle in its Convention at Lynchburg, it forfeited sympathy. It is useless to say that acquiescence in the Riddleberger settlement was a political necessity. We admit no political necessity which can make men join in dishonesty. If a party must be defeated because it will not be dishonorable, it will, if it is anything beyond the mere aggregation of self-seeking interests, suffer defeat and leave the question of success to take care of itself. Yet we should never have felt and expressed indignation as we did if these men had simply "acquiesced" in the Riddleberger settlement. Their "acquiescence" was of the most active and virulent kind. They were more ingenious and more unscrupulous than Riddleberger and Mahone themselves in devising laws to force the creditors to accept the repudiating act. Necessarily, therefore, as we continued to write, we gave less and less weight to the past courage of the Democratic party when we were directly confronted by the sight of its present turpitude, and less and less thought to that not inconsiderable class of men in the Old Dominion who to this day would gladly see the debt paid. That a paper like the State should consider the Democratic party of Virginia not only blameless but entitled to praise, inclines us almost to despair of the Commonwealth; but the memory of the work its schools and colleges, and especially the University of Virginia, are doing, and the knowledge that every State contiguous to it is advancing in wealth and education, revive hope, and point to the fact that if Virginia does not raise herself, she may be raised by forces beyond her control.

The same paper falsely accuses us of advising the Virginians to close their schools and pay their debts with the blankets taken from their beds. Why talk in this puerile strain about the abject poverty to be entailed by a fair debt settlement, when its chief Executive and militia are sent to join every picnic outside of the State? And who can doubt that if the finances of the State were put in the hands of any eminent financier, he would at once make such compromise as he could with the creditors, and extend the self-executing attribute of the tax-receivable coupons, if possible, so that any future attempt to unsettle the compromise should be absolutely useless? A course like this would sweep away the seeming poverty of the State at once, and bring in an era of prosperity worthy of its vast natural resources, its name and hopes. This present instability of the debt question is poisoning the well-being of the whole industrial system of the State. This is no figure, but simple fact. It may be only a suspicion, yet a suspicion which must arise, that the corporations which do not use the coupons in payment of taxes have not been brought to this passivity from pure patriotism, but because there have been bargains between them and the State by which very considerable advantages accrue to the corporations. Favors of this kind need not be open and direct. They may be managed in a careful and secret way familiar to politicians; and when individual taxpayers of Virginia, who cannot make such bargains, see corporations which are not noted for sentiment posing as aggregations of patriotism, they are naturally set to thinking.

The Political Committee of the Chicago Union League Club has been considering the labor troubles here and elsewhere with the view of inaugurating a movement to "harmonize existing and imaginary differences between employers and employees." This reminds us of the movements of twenty years ago to "reconcile religion and science," as if they could be got together in a room and made to shake hands, and promise ever after to agree about everything. There is nothing to harmonize between employers and employees, any more than between any other classes of citizens which have dealings with each other. The differences between them are generally due to a desire on the part of the employees to get more wages for less work, or a desire on the part of the employers to get more work for less wages. To call on either of them to be content with less, or with something different, is to take the management of their private business out of their hands. Is any club or society in the country prepared to undertake this task? Ought not poor Powderly's enterprise to be a warning against attempting it? Probably the affairs of a vast number of employers and employees would be better managed by outsiders than by themselves; but who can be got to take the job?

A tremendous struggle is in progress in that home of Labor, Pythagoras Hall. An auditing committee are at work day and night upon the financial accounts of District Assembly No. 49, trying to disentangle them. Their chief trouble seems to be to account for deficiencies. Last week they discovered a shortage of $5,700 in the Assistance Fund, but the officers of the Assembly explained that by saying that it had gone into the Maintenance Fund. Now a deficiency of $5,000 has been discovered in the Building Fund, and for this they can find no explanation whatever. Two of the Auditing Committee have resigned, saying as a reason that the accounts are so muddled that no one can make head or tail of them, and they do not care to append their names to a report. Another member says that "there is nobody in the Assembly with a head big enough to unravel the tangle." If the lunch checks of the Walking Delegates and Outside and Inside Esquires could be obtained, we have no doubt that a good deal of light would be thrown upon the accounts. But why attempt to untangle them? It is a very un-Knightly performance to attempt to make the Pythagoras Hall financiers keep their accounts in the same way as capitalists and monopolists do. No well-organized system of Labor, as the Powderlys, Quinns, Dunns, and Martin Ironses understand it, can stand on so unsympathetic a basis as that.

The Anarchists had a picnic on Sunday on Weehawken Heights. There were red flags and red ribbons and red hat-bands, and red boats on a small lake within the enclosure where the Reds assembled to do honor to their fellow-Anarchists now in jail at Chicago. An entrance fee of twenty-five cents was required to gain admission to the picnic. A practical Anarchist came along and attempted to enter without paying the fee. Some accounts say that he was a policeman in citizens' clothes, but this is immaterial from the Anarchist point of view, however important it may be in a court of Jersey justice. True anarchy required that the man should enter without paying, especially if there was any regulation requiring pay. Taking toll at a gate is only one of the forms of law and order which anarchy rails at and seeks to abolish. The practical Anarchist insisted upon his right to go in without paying anything. The gate-keeper called for help, and some of his minions came forward with pickets hastily torn from the fence, and began beating the practical man over the head. Then the crowd outside began to throw stones at the crowd inside, and the latter retorted in kind. A few pistols were fired and one boy was shot through the hand. The meeting was a great success in the way of promoting practical anarchy, the rioting being protracted to a late hour in the afternoon. Anarchy, like charity, should always begin at home.

The public of this city is getting very tired of the George-McGlynn movement, whatever it may be. The introduction of the O'Brien trouble brought a little variety into it for a moment, but only for a moment. O'Brien is now gone, and the controversy about him must necessarily languish in his absence. Can Mr. George and Dr. McGlynn not take a brief holiday, and give the press and the public a rest? It is quite clear that the work of abolishing poverty and property in land will last a good while, so a few weeks' cessation of this dreadful noise would cause no perceptible delay. In the meantime, why is there no movement towards the occupation by the poor of the countless acres of land around New York which, for agricultural purposes, can be had on payment of the taxes? As far as we can make out, the George-McGlynn people will be content with nothing but very high-priced city lots. But is this fair or wise? Would it not be better to begin by taking any land the owners are willing to surrender on easy terms, and attack the Wall Street and Fifth Avenue lots afterwards? Moreover, we most earnestly beg Dr. McGlynn to settle in some manner with the Pope, if possible, before July 4. That trouble also drags along in a most wearisome manner. We cannot keep speculating any longer as to whether McGlynn will "go to Rome," and what the Pope will do if he refuses. The number of those who do not care where Dr. McGlynn goes, provided he goes somewhere, or what the Pope thinks about him, is assuming alarming dimensions, and is even threatening the Doctor with early obscurity.

Considering the deliberate purpose with which this country has been made a dumping-ground for the human garbage of Europe, and in particular the recent instances of British offences against our law in sending "assisted" emigrants over here, it is somewhat amusing to find that the House of Commons has ordered the Board of Trade to make a special report on complaints that certain trades in East London and two or three other great cities are "overrun" with foreign immigrants, to the disadvantage of British workers. It is still more amusing when we consider that this action is taken in a country wherein the total number of foreigners is nothing like one-half of one per cent. of the total population; indeed, if we do not count about 20,000 Americans included in the last census—who really are not foreigners—the proportion is not one-third of one per cent. Yet this proportion constitutes a grievance, and the British legislature and newspapers are wondering what must be done about it. One London paper says: "We suppose a nation has a right to refuse to receive paupers, though it is not a Christian proceeding, bearing much too close an analogy to the practice of drowning the shipwrecked." We should rather suppose it a more Christian proceeding to refuse to receive paupers, which means sending them back to their friends and neighbors, and to a country where they have a "settlement" and a legal claim to support, than it is to export them from Great Britain to America as a means of avoiding that claim, and merely to get rid of them. And concerning the "analogy to the practice of drowning the ship-wrecked," we must consider that a specially unfortunate remark. What we do, and mean to do, instead of drowning them, is literally to put them on board ship again. Surely this is a Christian proceeding.

The "venue clause," as it is called, of the Irish Coercion Bill, that is, the clause giving the Government power to send offenders for trial to England, has been dropped, after a conference with the Liberal-Unionist leaders, as every one expected it would be. In fact, it has always been supposed that it was put in in order to be dropped as a concession to the Liberal-Unionists in case it was found too strong for them. The substitute proposed by Lord Hartington and his supporters is trial by a Commission of judges. This feature is copied from the Gladstone Coercion Bill of 1882, but the Irish Judges protested against it with such vehemence that the Government of that day never made any use of it, and, in fact, never found any extraordinary difficulty in getting the juries to convict. The judges held that it was putting upon them a duty which was unconstitutional, and was calculated to weaken popular confidence in their integrity and impartiality. No answer was ever made or ever attempted to their arguments. No such tribunal has ever been set up in the United Kingdom in time of peace since the Star Chamber.

England has signed a convention with the Sultan binding herself to evacuate Egypt in three years if the condition of the country at that date will warrant the withdrawal of the troops, but reserving the right also to re-occupy the country, either in conjunction with Turkey, or after due notice to Turkey, if it should seem necessary. The other Powers have been asked to endorse this arrangement, but they seem in no haste to do so, and, in fact, France shows a disposition to kick against it, and Russia is supposed to be egging her on in her opposition. Every French Ministry finds it absolutely necessary to make it appear that France is exerting some influence on English policy in Egypt.

The Belgian Liberals have had their convention at Brussels, and have issued the programme by which they hope to allay existing discontents. They call for gratuitous and obligatory education; the regulation of child labor in factories; the provision of technical schools for adults; the separation of Church and State; the abolition of conscription and of substitution; an income tax; the repeal of the duties lately imposed on foreign cattle and meat; insurance against accidents for workingmen on the Prussian plan, and some sort of machinery for regulating the relations between labor and capital. But the Belgian Liberals are somewhat in the position of the English Liberals, in that they are assailed both by the Conservatives in front and the Radicals in the rear. They do not go far enough for "Labor," and they go too far for the Church and Capital. The trouble with Belgium is, however, the fundamental one, that she cannot produce cheaply enough to hold her own in the foreign markets by which her industries were built up, and her workingmen, like the French, will not emigrate.

The canal at Kiel opening a passage across Schleswig-Holstein between the Baltic and the North Sea, which has just been begun, and will be finished, it is thought, in eight years, is one of the great feats of engineering, like the Alpine tunnels, and the Suez and Panama Canals, for which this century will be for ever famous. It starts from the mouth of the Elbe, and will end at Holtenau, almost in the port of Kiel. It will save the 35,000 trading vessels which pass through the Kattegat and the Sound every year a détour of nearly 500 miles. Its strategic advantages to Germany will be hardly less important, for it will preclude the possibility of her fleet being cut in two in a war in which Denmark was in alliance with the enemy. The canal will put Kiel, the principal German arsenal in the Baltic, in direct communication with the principal military port of the North Sea, Wilhelmshafen. The entrance of the canal will be fortified at both ends.

As might have been expected, the Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, Prince Bismarck's semi-official organ, has come out completely victorious in its animated controversy with Katkoff's Moscow Gazette regarding the relations of Russia and Austria-Hungary before and during the Turkish war of 1877. Premier Tisza's declarations in the Hungarian Parliament, in answer to an interpellation, have confirmed—instead of refuting—the Berlin journal's surprising revelation, that a formal agreement was secretly entered into by the two imperial Governments in reference to the course and sequences of that struggle. The Pesther Lloyd, which vehemently rushed to the rescue of Count Andrássy, the former Austro-Hungarian Minister of Foreign Affairs, from the national odium which the communications of the Norddeutsche were calculated to bring upon him, continues, it is true, to insist upon the inaccuracy of some of the details, but the main points have been admitted by Andrássy's principal co-worker at the time, and the testimony wrung from him, though couched in diplomatic phraseology, is decisive. History may now enter the following in its pages: In January, 1877, Gortchakoff bought Austria-Hungary's neutrality in the impending Russian war with Turkey at the price of Russia's consent to the former empire's occupation of Bosnia and Herzegovina; "the European mandate" for that occupation given by the Berlin Congress, in July, 1877, was thus only the ratification of a previous compact; Andrássy, incited by ambitious diplomatic aims, acted throughout a disingenuous part towards his own country, Hungary, which clamored for an opposite policy; Court policies prevailed over the national sentiment, both in Russia and Hungary; Germany looked on complacently, knowing and minding her interests.

For a moment the German Chancellor's acrimonious journalistic warfare against the Slavophil press, the aim of which was not altogether clear, assumed a direction apparently unfriendly to the managers of the Austro-Hungarian diplomacy, and foreshadowing a rapprochement toward Russia, in case the latter discarded the pernicious advice of her Germanophobists. This impression, however, which caused some consternation in Buda-Pesth, was speedily dispelled by other inspired communications, which clearly showed that the German Foreign Office, though not particularly mindful of the sensibilities of its political friends when points could be scored at their expense in a piquant controversy with hostile critics, was by no means ready to delight the latter by an interesting plunge in a new direction. The affair ends thus: The Moscow and Pesth journalists have been confounded by the exhibition of their ignorance of contemporary diplomatic facts of grave import, but the revelation is particularly humiliating to the Russian assailants of Bismarck, for it shows that their Government secretly lowered itself before Austria-Hungary, and to no purpose, while Tisza, called to account for his and Andrássy's formerly unavowed dealings with Russia—in opposition to the wishes of their nation—could, in his defence, point with triumphant effect to the advantageous results of their performance: the occupation of Bosnia and Herzegovina and the holding there of a politico-military position calculated, as the late developments in Bulgaria have shown, completely to baffle all Russia's attempts at permanently establishing her influence in the Balkan Peninsula.

The Hungarian Parliament which has just closed its sessions, has probably been the most obsequious of all the legislatures with which the long-lived Cabinet of M. Tisza has ever had to deal. Following the behests, one may almost say, of that political chief, it passed without hesitation the most important enactments in the history of Hungary since her parliamentary reconstruction in 1867, the reduced Opposition wasting the remnants of its strength in desultory and almost aimless efforts. It transformed the Upper House in a radical manner, excluding a vast number of the hereditary magnates through a limitation based on property. It lengthened the legislative periods of the House of Representatives from three years to five. It increased the military strength of the kingdom by enacting a Landsturm law, such as the threatening complications in the Balkan Peninsula and the attitude of Russia seemed to demand. It finally passed the third series of the decennial articles of financial agreement with Cisleithan Austria required by the fundamental dual basis of Austria-Hungary. It gave its full support to the foreign policy of Count Kálnoky, applauding him for patronizing Servia against Bulgaria, when the latter had, by a revolutionary stroke, extended the sway of her Prince over Eastern Rumelia, and much more cordially when, on the downfall of Prince Alexander, he suddenly became the great defender of Bulgarian autonomy. It readily voted all the financial measures proposed by the Government, including new taxes and new loans, although in this field of its activity M. Tisza's Cabinet has had no opportunity to boast of success, the yearly growing deficits having of late assumed alarming proportions. With these deficits the new Parliament, the elections for which are to take place in the latter part of this month, will have to cope seriously. The complexion of the new Assembly is expected to differ little from that of its predecessors, the Liberal majority over both Conservatives and Radicals remaining overwhelming.

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S NEWS.

[WEDNESDAY, June 8, to TUESDAY, June 14, 1887 inclusive.]

DOMESTIC.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND left the retreat on Saranac Lake where he had spent a brief vacation, on June 9, breakfasted with Gov. Hill at Albany on June 10, and the next day was at his desk in the White House.

The resolutions passed by certain Grand Army posts in Iowa uncomplimentary to the President, apropos of his proposed visit to St. Louis when the Grand Army will be in encampment there, provoked Gen. Sherman to write a letter, wherein he said: "Mr. Cleveland is the President of the United States, by a fair election of all our people, and Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. . . . The idea of his being insulted, much less endangered, should he be on the stand alongside of our Commander-in-Chief, Gen. Fairchild, when the Grand Army is passing in review, seems to me monstrous. Brave men are never ungenerous, and the Iowa soldiers were brave men. . . . Should Mr. Cleveland accept the invitation, which I hope he will, to attend the parade of the Grand Army of the Republic at St. Louis on the 28th of September next, I will stand by his side or march past in the ranks of Ransom Post, as may be ordered by Gen. Fairchild."

A Committee of the Grand Army of the Republic has made a draft of a proposed Dependent Pension Bill, which in its main features is similar to the bill that the President vetoed, and copies of it have been sent to all the Grand Army posts to get the approval of as many veterans as possible. The purpose is to have it introduced in the Fiftieth Congress.

The President on June 14 appointed Clarence H. Pitkin of Vermont to be United States Attorney for the District of Vermont.

The recent renewal of effort by a number of Democratic politicians to induce the President to dismiss Republicans who yet hold posts of importance, has caused an approximately accurate estimate to be made of the number of offices of importance in the national Government outside the civil-service rules yet held by Republicans. The estimate is that there are 400 Presidential postmasters and 8,000 of the fourth class, 5 secretaries of legations, 80 consuls, several important bureau and division officers in the departments at Washington, 2 appraisers of merchandise, 2 superintendents of mints and assayers, 1 collector of internal revenue, 3 inspectors of steam vessels, 5 United States district attorneys, 6 United States marshals, 8 Territorial judges, 2 pension agents, a few Indian inspectors and Indian special agents, 10 Indian agents, and 5 special agents of the General Land Office.

A committee appointed some time ago to investigate the methods of business in the New York Custom-house has made an important report to Collector Magone. It speaks of the Custom-house as an "antiquated edifice," and says: "It would be difficult to find a building of the proper dimensions less suitable for the purpose, or one more positively incurable in its defects." The committee suggests a reduction in the salary of clerks entering the service to $1,000, increasing this as the employees become more proficient; it approves Mr. Hewitt's bill recommending the appointment of persons acting under State authority as notaries public solely for the administration of customs oaths, to save importers much loss of time, and suggests many other changes.

The Iroquois Club of Chicago recently adopted a resolution setting forth the opinion of the members that the Inter-State Commerce Law ought to be enforced for "the interests of the public," and the arguments for its enforcement have been published by a committee of the club and will be presented to the Inter-State Commerce Commission. The Railroad Commissioners of the Northwestern States, in a conference at St. Paul June 10, adopted a resolution setting forth their opinion that the phrase "under substantially similar circumstances and conditions" in the fourth section of the Inter-State Law should be construed liberally, and that a lower rate to manufacturer or producer is not in conflict with the spirit of this section of the law, provided all persons and localities under "substantially similar circumstances and conditions" are treated alike; and asking the National Commission for an interpretation of this clause.

Representatives of the Indian tribes in the Indian Territory met in a "citizenship council" at Eufaula June 5, and discussed the condition of the race for four or five days following. One of the prominent members of the council, Towoconie Jim, chief of the Wichitas, made a speech, the conclusion of which was this: "If I go to a tailor to have a suit of clothes made, and the tailor just takes a look at me and then says: 'All right, go home, and I will send the clothes,' I am almost certain to have a suit which does not fit. This is the way the United States Congress has done with my people. They have merely looked at us and sent us this suit, which does not fit at all, and we cannot wear it." The Council made an earnest appeal in behalf of civilized and wild tribes of the Territory against the act providing for the allotment of lands in severalty. They said that it would engulf all the Indians and tribes of the Territory in one catastrophe to the enrichment of land monopolies, when even those with the civilized machinery of justice seem powerless to secure their rights. They signed a memorial that the President stay the operations of the law until they shall be in condition to be benefited by it, and that the act may be not enforced until they have the opportunity of testing their rights before the judiciary of the United States. They requested Congress to pass an enabling act, whereby all questions affecting the rights of Indians under treaty stipulations may be referred to the courts of the United States, and receive judicial settlement. Mr. Atkins, the Indian Commissioner, thinks that they have been incited to make this opposition by white men.

There has been another outbreak of the hostile Apache Indians in Arizona, and several whites have been killed, among them Michael Grace, a well-known cattle man. More than 100 warriors, all well armed, are thought to be on the warpath. They have retreated to the mountains and set fire to the woods behind them to throw the cavalry off their trail.

In reply to an inquiry by the British Minister whether a number of Crofters, a part of whose fares to the United States are to be paid by the British Government, will be hindered from landing by the Pauper Immigration Law, Secretary Bayard has written that "the Department is unable to give any assurance that any particular class of immigrants will be permitted to land. The provisions of the law look to the actual condition of each person and are impartial in their operation."

At Boston, in the United States Circuit Court on June 13, the case of the United States vs. the American Bell Telephone Company, to vacate the Bell patent, came up for argument on the demurrer of the Telephone Company.

In a suit brought against the State of North Carolina in the name of a citizen of that State to compel the payment, by the levy of a special tax, of the overdue coupons on State bonds issued in 1869, Judge Bond, in the United States Circuit Court, held that the acts subsequently passed by the Legislature to stop the collection of taxes to pay this interest are null and void, and that the agents of the State must collect the taxes to pay it. North Carolina has funded her debt except this issue of bonds.

The effort continues to be made to divide the Territory of Dakota with the hope that the southern part may be admitted into the Union. A call has been sent out for the residents of the southern part to assemble in county conventions on July 7, and to select delegates to a general convention of the friends of division to be held at Huron on July 13. The objects of this convention are to provide for a thorough canvass of South Dakota before the next election, to get as many votes as possible in favor of division.

William E. Chandler was chosen by the Republican caucus of the New Hampshire Legislature on June 9 as the party's candidate for the United States Senate, and elected June 14.

The protracted strike of workmen at the coke ovens in Pennsylvania had caused the shutting down of iron mills in Chicago and thrown many workmen there out of employment. But the advance in wages asked for was granted June 13 by one of the coke companies, which gives employment to 3,000 men, and the burning of enough coke was begun again to enable the mills that depend on it to resume operations. At a coal mine near Scranton, Pa., where there had been a strike for several months, working miners in a fight with strikers shot three of them June 9. Building is yet practically suspended at St. Paul by a strike of 1,200 carpenters, who refuse to work more than nine hours a day. The contractors are resolved that a day's work shall be ten hours. The practical cessation of building at Chicago by strikes and lockouts of the carpenters and masons and hod-carriers is not yet broken. The Union Labor party in Iowa held a State Convention June 9 and nominated a State ticket. The Chicago Socialist Society June 12 adopted a petition to the Governor of Illinois to veto the Anti Conspiracy Bill, which has passed both houses of the Legislature. At a Sunday meeting of New York Anarchists at Oak Cliff Park, N. J., there was a fight, in which a number of pistol shots were fired and two constables wounded. John Most was one of the speakers.

The celebration of the discovery of natural gas at Findlay, O., was extended over several days, and an important part of the programme was the delivery, June 9, of after-dinner speeches by Senator Sherman and Gov. Foraker on the industrial building up of the West, and the part that natural gas is doing and will do towards it.

There has been very active speculation in coffee, and the price was advanced for a brief time quite a hundred per cent. above the usual range of prices during the last few years. A sudden "break" in the price on June 13 caused the failure of three firms in this city.

The Havemeyer sugar refinery in Brooklyn, N. Y., which was one of the largest in the United States, was burned early on the morning of June 11. One man perished, and the loss was nearly $1,000,000. So mysterious was the origin of the fire that it is suspected to have been incendiary.

A pastoral letter from Bishop Potter in regard to the movement for erecting a great cathedral in this city was read June 12 in the Protestant Episcopal churches of this diocese. After referring to the deep interest taken in the project by the late Bishop Horatio Potter, the letter suggests that the undertaking "may well be made, in some way or in some part of it, to commemorate his exemplary life and unwearied services." The letter goes on: "Those of us whose home is in the city of New York have long felt that there was needed in this metropolitan city a metropolitan church, whose sittings should be free to all without condition or reserve, and whose services should welcome to its stalls every clergyman of the diocese as to his mother's roof. We have felt, too, that there was needed, as a centre of the mission work of a great city and of representative charities to be grouped about it, a sanctuary at once stately and ample, where all great gatherings of our people might be had, and where memorable events and anniversaries, whether local or national, might find their fitting observance; and yet again it has been felt that a diocese such as this should provide a sanctuary where its Bishop may administer the Word and sacraments and confer the Church's orders as other than a visitor or guest." About half a million dollars have already been subscribed to the fund to build the proposed cathedral.

The case brought in the Supreme Court in this city to test the validity of the law which prohibits the selling of liquor on Sunday, even by hotel-keepers to their guests, was decided against the hotel-keeper who brought it, the Judge holding that he could sell liquor only by virtue of a license which specifies that liquors shall not be sold on Sunday, and that a violation of this condition annuls the license, so that he cannot lawfully sell liquor at all.

A bronze statue of Nathan Hale was unveiled in the Capitol at Hartford, Conn., June 14, and formally transferred by the Nathan Hale Statue Commission, for which Mr. Charles Dudley Warner was the spokesman, to the State, and was accepted by Gov. Lounsbury.

On Sunday, June 12, a monument erected in the burial plot of the New York Press Club in Cypress Hills Cemetery was dedicated. Addresses were made by several newspaper writers.

Among the deaths of the week are those of Bishop Stevens (Episcopal) of Pennsylvania, June 11, in his sixty-second year; Mrs. Andrew D. White at Ithaca, N. Y., in her fifty-seventh year, on June 8; the Rev. W. W. Bennett, a prominent Methodist preacher in Virginia, who ran the blockade during the civil war and went to England to get Bibles for the Confederate soldiers, on June 9; George Draper of Hopedale, Mass., who was one of the leading manufacturers in New England, and a former abolitionist; James N. Buffum, an older and more prominent abolitionist, at his home in Lynn, Mass., June 12; the Rev. Edward Woolsey Bacon, son of the late Rev. Dr. Leonard Bacon, at Ocean View Farm, Santa Clara County, Cal., on June 7.

FOREIGN.

Rapid progress has been made in the House of Commons, in committee, with the Irish Crimes Bill, by the frequent use of the closure rule. Clause four was adopted June 9, and the section providing for the removal of venue to London was stricken from the bill. Mr. Smith, the leader of the House, on June 10 moved that on June 17 the Chairman should put the question on any motion, amendment, or proposal relating to the clause then under discussion, and on each remaining clause of the bill. Under closure the motion was carried by a vote of 245 to 93. During the debate Mr. Gladstone said that he would not offer futile opposition, but wished to protest with emphasis against such a procedure. Mr. Parnell also made a speech in protest, and moved an amendment that the House decline to sanction a resolution limiting freedom of debate and assailing the rights of minorities, which was rejected. The gravity of this procedure is in the fact that the Government has given the leader of the House the power to decree by an absolute majority (not by three to one as Mr. Gladstone proposed in 1881-82) that discussion on any bill shall be closed by a certain day—a power that the Liberals may in turn use as it is now used against them.

The fifth clause of the Crimes Bill, which deals with the proclaiming of districts, was taken up in the House of Commons June 13. Amendments that proclamations be made by order of the Privy Council instead of by the Viceroy, that proclamations be issued only on the report of a Judge of the High Court after a local inquiry, and that the authority of the Viceroy, in proclaiming, be limited to districts where it might be necessary for the prevention of crime and outrage, were rejected; and an amendment by the Government providing for summary jurisdiction and change of venue in cases where crimes are committed before the issue of a proclamation after the passage of the act, was adopted.

A section of the Parnellites has refused to listen to the advice of Mr. Gladstone that only the weightier points in the Crimes Bill be discussed, and unimportant amendments are offered. There is now no concerted plan of opposition; and Mr. Chamberlain, speaking at a Unionist dinner June 14, said he rejoiced that the game of lawlessness and disorder was up at last; for the people had examined Mr. Gladstone's statements for themselves, and their faith in his judgment and patriotism had been rudely shaken.

Provoked by Mr. Gladstone's "stumping" in Wales, the Liberal Association on June 8 passed resolutions regretting that while he had made minor concessions with reference to the Irish bill of 1886, he adhered to the plan for an Irish Parliament, and expressing the conviction that his speeches will discourage the hope of reunion. Little reason is now left for hope of a union of the sections of the Liberal party.

The London Times continues to publish articles on "Parnellism and Crime," in the effort to show that the Parnellites have been in alliance with the violent Irish party in England and in the United States. On June 13 the accusation was made in one of these articles that it was an opportune remittance from Mr. Parnell that enabled Byrne to escape to France, and the Times asked: "Is Mr. Parnell prepared to take steps to put this statement to proof or even to contradict it?"

More evictions of tenants at Bodyke, Ireland, have been made. Many of them barricaded their houses, women threw boiling water from the windows on the police, and there have been several fights. The priests have in most cases prevailed on the people to desist from violence, and the houses have been entered by armed policemen, and the plunder broken and thrown out; and some arrests have been made.

An Irish meeting was called at Bodyke on Sunday, June 12, to protest against the evictions and the Government prohibited it; but Michael Davitt eluded the police and addressed 5,000 persons at Feakle and a crowd at Scariff. He asserted the people's right of meeting in public, and said that if the people were armed they could deal with the black-coated burglar brigade as they deserved. He expressed the expectation that the meeting at Scariff would be the last which he should have a chance to address before the Coercion Act would again give him the luxury of a prison plank bed. He gave this advice: "Boycott the inquisition clauses of the Coercion Act, and welcome imprisonment rather than assist the Government to make the act operative."

Queen Victoria has signed the Anglo Turkish convention concerning Egypt, and it has been presented to the Sultan.

Queen Victoria will put on the state robes and be surrounded with all the insignia of sovereignty after entering Westminster Abbey on the day of the jubilee service. Eight thousand troops will line the route, besides a guard of honor of 600 persons.

The jubilee gift that the Pope will send to Queen Victoria is a mosaic reproduction of Raphael's fresco representing a figure of Poetry. The two young priests who will convey it to London will be made bishops in honor of the occasion.

The jubilee yacht race around Great Britain and Ireland was begun June 14, twelve yachts entering the race. They were started by the Prince of Wales. The weather was good and the Genesta soon took the lead.

Lord Tennyson has been suffering with gout, and has been ordered by his physician to take a yacht cruise.

The five steamers of the Monarch Steamship Line were offered for sale, in a lump, in London June 9, but the highest bid was only £112,000. This was not accepted, and the steamers will be sold singly.

Emperor William of Germany was so ill on June 8 as to require morphia to cause sleep, and for several days he did not leave his bed.

Dr. Mackenzie, the English surgeon, on June 8 performed another operation on the throat of the Crown Prince, Frederick William, and, it is reported, gave assurance of a cure. In spite of this hopeful report of the Crown Prince's condition, which is officially given out, the fear finds daily expression that the disease will prove fatal. The Berlin correspondent of the London Chronicle wrote, June 13, that Bismarck and the royal family consider the Prince's early death certain, and that after making a microscopical examination of the growth cut from his throat, Prof. Virchow went to the palace, and, with tears in his eyes, declared that the malady was incurable. But there is no better authority than rumor for these statements.

There is a bill under discussion in the German Reichstag to require greater protection for women and children in factories. The clause increasing the minimum age at which children may be employed from 12 to 13 years was passed June 8.

The trial of members of the Alsatian Patriotic League on a charge of high treason, for supporting attempts to separate Alsace-Lorraine from Germany, was begun at Leipzig June 13. A pipe-maker in Metz has been fined for making pipes with a carved image of Gen. Boulanger on them. Albert Delpit, an American by birth, and a well-known French journalist, was expelled from Alsace on June 12, after he had obtained permission to visit a friend in the province, because of the anti German tone of his writings.

The Municipal Council of Paris has passed a vote of censure on the Prefect of Police, the Minister of the Interior, and the Minister of Fine Arts, holding them responsible for the recent disaster at the Opéra Comique, and has adopted a resolution granting theatres, cafés, and concert halls three months to substitute electric lights for gas.

Herrmann, the celebrated prestidigitateur, died at Carlsbad June 8, aged sixty-six; Anselme Polycarpe Batbie, the French lawyer and statesman, died on June 13.

Crowds of persons made a pilgrimage to Caprera June 7 to commemorate the anniversary of Garibaldi's death. They laid wreaths on his tomb and visited his house.

The flood in Hungary has not subsided. Rescuing parties have been obliged to force the helpless people at some places into the boats, because they refused to leave their houses and property. Marauders, wading through the waters at night, have plundered deserted houses, and the suffering of the common people has been great. Several persons have committed suicide, and many women have become insane through terror and hunger. A vast area is inundated, and there have been recent rains.

The Russian Government has issued an order forbidding Coreans or Chinese to settle within Russian territory bordering on Corea or China.

It is reported from Merv that the Russians at Tchardjui are fitting out two steamers and a number of iron lighters to transport material for the Transcaspian Railway and to reconnoitre on the Amu-Daria River; and that the British are equipping two light-draft steamers with steel guns for use upon the upper Amu-Daria.

A succession of severe earthquake shocks in the province of Semiretchensk, Turkestan, has killed more than a hundred persons and hurt many more, and done great damage to property. One town is reported to be almost destroyed.

The American Board of Foreign Missions has been informed of a famine in Asia Minor, in a region of which Adana is the centre. The afflicted district contains more than 100,000 inhabitants, of whom 80,000 are destitute, and cannot be kept from starvation without help from abroad. Many of them have sold their furniture, in some cases even their beds. The harvest time has passed, but not a single sheaf of grain will be cut on many of the plains, which are generally so fertile.

PROHIBITION AS A SOLVENT OF PARTIES.

In his speech on the political situation recently delivered before the Commonwealth Club of this city, and published in a late number of Harper's Weekly, Mr. Geo. William Curtis made a striking comparison between the attitude of the anti-slavery Whigs toward their old party forty years ago, and the attitude of the temperance Republicans toward their old party now. "The Whig party," he said, "was more anti slavery than the Democratic, and the Whig leaders declared that for anti-slavery Whigs to take separate action was to betray their own cause by aiding its worst enemies. But after Charles Sumner, then a Whig, had eloquently besought Mr. Webster to add to his well-won title of Defender of the Constitution the nobler name of Defender of Humanity, and to place himself at the head of the Whig party as an anti-slavery party, and Mr. Webster had politely regretted their difference of opinion upon the relative importance of public questions; and when the speeches and votes of Whigs upon the Mexican war aided what seemed to Sumner and the Conscience Whigs the conspiracy of slavery; they saw in New England, as their fellow-believers saw in Ohio and New York, that the Whigs as a party cared more for what they called Whiggism, and for the success of the party, with all the necessary conditions of success, than for the anti-slavery cause; and the secession began which ended in the formation of the Republican party." In like manner, he pointed out, the temperance Republicans fear that the Republican party cares more for what it calls Republicanism than for the cause of temperance, which seems to its friends the chief issue, and they begin to march away. "In vain the Republican leaders cry, and cry truly, that they are more friendly to temperance legislation than the Democrats, and that to desert them is in effect to aid the saloon. The distinctive temperance vote steadily increases. The retiring forces reply that had the anti-slavery Whigs listened to that siren plea, there would have been no Republican party. It is those who believe a cause to be paramount to all other causes who give it victory. In the spirit that formed the Republican party they will apparently raise their separate standard once again and rally their recruits from the Republican camp."

Since Mr. Curtis delivered this speech the accuracy of his diagnosis has been remarkably confirmed by the course of events in the State of Webster and Sumner. There is no question that a majority of the Republicans in Massachusetts believe in prohibition, and desire to have the principle embedded in the Constitution of the State. The men who believe in prohibition feel sure that a majority of the voters in the State are with them in this matter, and are confident that a prohibition amendment to the Constitution would be carried if it were submitted to the people. Pending the settlement of the constitutional question, the temperance Republicans want to have the present restrictive laws made still more rigorous. The Republican State Convention last fall committed the party in unqualified terms to further restrictive legislation and to the submission of the amendment. After referring to the disastrous effects of intemperance, the resolution said: "We favor such further legislation as may be necessary to render the existing laws more effective. Believing, also, that whenever a great public question demands settlement an opportunity should be given the people to express their opinion thereon, we favor the submission to the people of an amendment to our Constitution prohibiting the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors to be used as a beverage." The applause with which this resolution was greeted showed that the platform-makers had correctly interpreted the sentiment of the delegates.

But the Republican managers never intended to have the pledges of this platform redeemed. They were made only in order to hold prohibition Republicans in the party, and prevent their supporting the Prohibition candidate. They succeeded in their purpose, for it is safe to say that at least 10,000 Republicans who would have joined the third party except for this plank, supported Ames because of it, and he had only 9,463 plurality. The Legislature having met, the temperance people asked to have the campaign pledges redeemed, but measure after measure, aiming at further restriction of the liquor traffic, which passed the lower branch, was killed in the upper, although twenty-five of the forty Senators are Republicans. Months passed without the first step being taken regarding the amendment. At last a resolve proposing its submission was brought forward in the Senate, and allowed to pass that body, the Republican Senators who are friendly to "the liquor interest" requiring their friends in the House to shoulder the responsibility this time. They responded last week, when, although fourteen Democrats voted for submission, enough Republicans voted the other way to leave the majority tantalizingly short of the requisite two-thirds. It was the same sort of trick which the Republican managers in New York played at Albany a few years ago, and everybody of any sense knows that it was understood, from the very day the pledge of submission was made in the platform, that it was made for campaign purposes only, and that it should be broken after it had served those purposes.

The course of the Legislature has opened the eyes of many men who believe in temperance, but who have hitherto supported the Republican party in the belief that they could secure their ends through that party. Even before this latest performance, a revolt had started in one of the Western Massachusetts towns, which is full of significance. Conway is a rural town of Franklin County, immediately adjoining Ashfield, the summer residence of Mr. Curtis. A few weeks ago the following paper was drawn up and circulated for signatures: "We, the undersigned, legal voters of Conway, promise our hearty support to the Prohibition party, provided twenty-five voters of this town agree to the same." Within a short time it was signed by 70 men, 65 Republicans—one-half of the Republican vote last year—and 5 Democrats. The correspondent of the county Republican paper says that they are "the prominent and influential men of our town," and their high standing with their old associates is shown by the fact that they include the Chairman, Secretary, and two other members of the Republican Town Committee, and two men who have been elected to the Legislature in past years by the Republican party. Such an incident would be startling if it stood alone, but there seems to be no reason why it may not be duplicated in many another town. Dr. John Blackmer of Springfield, who has figured as candidate for Lieutenant-Governor on the Prohibitory ticket, and is a member of the State Committee, tells a Republican reporter that the method employed at Conway does not differ from what is being done all over the State, excepting that perhaps the success is more complete there than at the average place. The State Committee's intention is to have the party thoroughly organized and in working condition by the next election. The Greenfield Gazette and Courier, the Republican county paper, after a tribute to the high character of the Conway Republicans, makes these comments: "We cannot say that we are surprised at the movement, or that we should marvel if the movement should become contagious. The Republican party promises, but does not religiously keep its promises on the liquor question. It is hampered by a desire to appease the liquor interest and does not dare to cut loose and become the champion of prohibition in deed as well as in word."

The coming year is evidently to witness a remarkable development of the Prohibition party. Hitherto the Republicans who believed in prohibition did not dare to support the Prohibition party, for fear that they might let the Democrats into power and so "ruin the country." But that bogy has been effectually done for, and in 1888 they will vote as they choose.

SOCIALISTIC PLATITUDES.

Mr. Morrison I. Swift, writing in the New-Englander on Socialism, draws a rather lugubrious picture of the dangers with which it threatens the civilized world, and then says: "How to meet the difficulties which this paper has outlined, we shall not here undertake to discover." This—without meaning to be disrespectful—irresistibly suggests the question, Why, when he had no solution to offer, did he write the article describing the "difficulties"? Surely we have had enough of these accounts of the power and peril of Socialism from writers and preachers who do not even pretend to know what is to be done to avoid them. Surely, too, every sensible and observing man knows that these articles feed the fires of anarchical discontent all over the country; that there is nothing more mischievous than persuading ignorant men that they are suffering from evils for which nobody knows any peaceful remedy.

It is true that, at the close of his essay, it occurs to Mr. Swift that he ought to give us at least a hint of how we are to get out of our scrape; so he says: "It is useless to face Socialism with old weapons. It can only be successfully met by an early recognition of whatever justice there is in its claims, and the hearty endeavor to alter the operations of the social organism accordingly." Now, is not this very unprofitable? How does it help us to be told that "we must recognize whatever justice there is in the claims of Socialism"? How are we to "recognize" it — in books, and pamphlets, and articles, or in the management of our private business? If in the latter, how? Moreover, how are we to know the "justice" in its claims? Where is this justice authoritatively described? Is there any general agreement about it among Socialists themselves? And what are "the operations of the social organism" which we must "alter"? Who is going to begin altering them, and who is to superintend the process and see that it does not go too far and yet goes far enough? Finally, ought not the discussion of this subject to be suspended among writers and orators who confess that they have no clear ideas whatever about it? Should we not all, before we approach it, follow Dr. Johnson's advice and clear our minds of cant?

Mr. Swift finds fault with us for attaching in these columns significance to the fact that the Socialist dissatisfaction with the world as it is, has not produced any sign of an economic reconstruction of society in the Socialistic direction; for, says he, "we have been accustomed to believe that a very essential part of any social reconstruction is a change in the mental attitude of men, which finally culminates in a change of visible institutions." And the first change, he maintains, has taken place. This would be important if there were anything new in Socialism in its present form, which is simple discontent with the unequal distribution of property. This mental attitude is as old as civilization, and has found expression at some period or other either in the religion or politics of every civilized race. The reason why nothing has ever come of it is that the experience of mankind has shown, in every age, that to secure a more equal division of property you must not only secure a change of mental attitude—that is, a change of political or economical opinions—but a change in human character. In other words, it has been found that when you go to work to "alter the operations of the social organism," what concerns you most is not what people think about the social organism, but how they behave in it. A man's "views" or "mental attitude," for instance, are of very little consequence to those whom he asks to take him into partnership on an equal footing in working an iron mill. What they seek to know about him is whether he is industrious, intelligent, sober, faithful, peaceable, and frugal, and will contribute his full share to the production of the mill. If he is, they are willing to get him into their "organism." If he is not, they get rid of him, no matter what his mental attitude may be. It has always been so, and, Mr. Swift may rely on it, so it will always be. If we threw our argument into the George-McGlynn form, we should say that God meant human society to be organized always, and, on the whole, in the interest of the industrious, prudent, self-denying, ingenious, shrewd and honest people; and will on no account permit it to be controlled by the lazy, stupid, and shiftless, or reorganized for their benefit, no matter what changes their mental attitude may undergo, seeing that their opinions almost always change in the direction of more work for their neighbors and less for themselves.

FORESTS AS PLAYGROUNDS.

Lovers of the woods will welcome the tidings of a new movement affecting the heart of the Adirondacks. A number of gentlemen have lately bought the greater part of Mount Marcy (Tahawus), with intervening country to the Hunters' Pass at the head of Elk Lake, including the Ausable Ponds, and intend to preserve it all and to make many improvements, rendering this wild region more accessible and enjoyable, without affecting its peculiar charm of wildness. We learn that they are already at work upon the road leading to the Lower Ausable Pond from the head of the Keene Valley (at the Beede House), hitherto a "pass of fear," even in good weather, while in wet it has been a mere ditch of mud and water, hateful to the hardiest pedestrian; not avoidable, either, by any trail or other subterfuge, since it was the only route to the interior woods, even for foot-travellers.

In all the region under mention, improvements of this kind are greatly needed. Owners of forests who hold them as investments have no interest in the convenience of summer visitors; and even those to whom such interest is of peculiar consequence—who get their living out of the annual flow of forest travel—rarely look beyond the immediate returns of a single season, or do anything, or plan anything, to make their neighborhoods more attractive. Adirondack hotel-keepers and guides commonly are very slow of perception in matters directly affecting their business, while a silly jealousy hinders the doing of many things which they know well enough might be done to their own advantage. A man will not improve a road leading to his hotel, or clear out a trail lying within his accustomed routes, because somebody else may profit by his labor. If an ugly windfall comes across a trail which a guide may traverse fifty times in a season, he will not chop it out, but will climb over it, or track around it, and make the parties he may conduct do so, until it decays. Yet if every guide would occasionally carry an axe, and clear out a bad place or two, say once a week, the trails would be in permanent fair condition. It is no answer to this to say that one must not look for the sidewalk of Broadway in the woods. People do not look for it there, but they look for the local equivalent of the Broadway sidewalk—that is, not the absence of all rough or wet places, but paths reasonably fair and open, on which one may swing along mostly at a good rate, and take some pleasure in the woods as he goes, not being obliged to put his whole mind to the process of getting on. A trail is not a place to endure hardness—that can be got ten feet away from it almost anywhere in the brush, and thoroughpaced amateurs of the forest who have leisure for exploring, know well the delights of inventing ways and "making" an untracked mountain-top or pass by the sheer power of their strength and wits matched against the intricacies of the woods. Trails are the means of getting from point to point comfortably, and should be as good as may be. Perhaps, so long as guides exist, guideboards will not be suffered in the Adirondacks under any ownership. It is altogether probable that the guides would tear them down as fast as they were put up, though this would be foolish, since a few direction posts here and there on the main trails would tempt into the woods many new travellers, out of whom much fresh profit would be got by the guides in the long run. Their property of camps and boats makes guides a necessity at last. Their present policy of making themselves necessary on all occasions, even for trivial little excursions, tends to scare people from the woods both by exaggerated notions of the difficulties of forest travel, and by increasing unnecessarily the cost of movement in any direction. This keeps many visitors in the settled and frequented places, whereas the guides should wish to see wandering made easy and inviting to the greatest possible number.

Under the new holding some of the things will be done that we have hinted at, but after all the first and last advantage of such a change of ownership is the security of the forests. At any rate they will remain, and this is no light thing, considering what has happened elsewhere in the Adirondack country, on the north, on the south, at the east, and even in parts about the centre. For instance, last summer, though the woods were yet visibly unbroken before him to the south, one lying for a nooning amid the stern splendors of the Indian Pass must have felt a chill as he heard distinctly the ring of axes by Lake Henderson steadily working up into the stretched wilderness. The railway from the north nearly reaches the St. Regis lake country, pushing in front the portable steam sawmill, before which miles of timber go down in a season. The railway from the east has invaded Loon Lake. Now the land taken up by the gentlemen who, though following their own pleasure, have laid us all under obligation, has hitherto belonged mainly to owners who cared only for the timber it carried; there was no certainty that it might not be cut over at any time, and ruined for all purposes of delight. Security against this is cause for public gratitude. There are other associations of gentlemen in the same category with these new owners—they are alike to be thanked, if not for public spirit as a sole motive, at least for the exercise of good taste in a manner by which the public must profit.

THE BACHELORS OF ART.

Now is the time for the annual article warning the college graduates that they are not so wise as they think they are; that they will be rudely undeceived if they suppose that their degree is going to do them any good in the great world in which they have entered, and especially in the newspaper offices. The warning touching the inadequacy of a mere college training for the work of journalism has to be made especially solemn, owing to a delusion among new Bachelors of Arts that editorial chairs can be had for the asking in any of the great towns of the country by anybody producing a degree from a salt-water college. They are accordingly carefully prepared by the existing occupants of these chairs for much bitter disappointment when they come round to look for work, a few weeks after commencement. The variety and intricacy of the technical training needed to produce spicy or pungent paragraphs or scathing editorials are much dwelt on, and the unfortunates who have determined to embrace journalism as a career for which any college man is fully equipped, are advised to prepare for a long period of laborious obscurity, during which even the older office boys will have the right to look down on them. As regards other callings, the outlook for them, they are told, is not much better. The best that can be said for their degree is that it will not hurt them. But, on the other hand, it is not concealed from them that the time they have spent in getting it has probably enabled younger men to get ahead of them in any business they may take up.

This journalistic custom of warning the graduates against self-importance seems, however, to be rather a tradition which has come down from a period when college training was rated far more highly as a special preparation for life than it is now. We doubt much if there be any calling except the ministry for which young men in our time think a college education a necessary preparation. Most young men go to college either because they desire earnestly for its own sake the kind of knowledge a college gives them, or because they think it would be a pleasant way of passing four years, and would give them a better social standing afterwards than they would otherwise have, and a feeling of cameraderie through life with a number of agreeable men of their own age. The number of those who enter college with a view to a definite pursuit is, we imagine, now really very small. A large proportion, by the time they are graduated, have probably made up their minds what they will try to do to get a living, but what they actually do afterwards is largely a matter of accident. It has been said with a good deal of truth, that two-thirds of the men in any calling do not know why they entered it. They mostly drift into it, along the line of least resistance. They push against every door they come to, and finally hit upon one which gives way and lets them in; but what it will open on, they rarely know, and do not always care. The father's calling has perhaps as much influence as anything else in deciding, when the young man has no special tastes of his own. Either the father likes it much, and determines that the son shall follow it, or he hates it, and determines that no child of his shall have anything to do with it. As a general rule, fathers are disposed to advise sons against following in their own footsteps, if it seem just as easy in order to get a living to follow in somebody else's, for the simple reason that they are so much impressed by the difficulties and drawbacks which they know. Then, too, there is hardly any man, however successful in his own calling, who has not dreamed of being something else which would have touched his imagination more, and is not, therefore, inclined to advise a young man in whom he feels an interest to try that something.

As a general rule the bulk of college graduates, like other young men, desire, most of all things, to be able to support themselves quickly in some employment for which they have some preparation, or at all events in which unfitness will not be immediately and sharply exposed. Graduates who find they are at all fluent with their pens, try their luck in newspaper offices, not because they think that their degree has made them journalists, but because they think journalism is the easiest paid work they can get hold of. Almost every man, young or old, graduate or non-graduate, is apt to be deceived by facility in writing or speaking. It is the hardest thing in the world for a glib man to believe that he has nothing to say worth saying. And there is no offence against human society which is apt to go so long unpunished and unexposed as the practice of talking rubbish or platitude—a man may grow old in this art without knowing it. So that the rapture of a young man on finding that he writes articles or makes speeches easily, is very comprehensible and pardonable. That on discovering it he should hurry to a newspaper office and offer to haul people over the coals for a moderate salary, is the most natural thing in the world. So also, however, is the indignation of the old hands who have already passed some years in the work. Every man who has a calling is irritated or disgusted by the suggestion that to practise it successfully needs neither training nor experience. This suggestion the new Bachelor of Arts who applies for editorial work, makes by implication, and hence the annual articles on his presumption and on the insignificance of his diploma. But he is not to blame. He is simply a man of his time.

"ALCESTIS" IN OXFORD.

OXFORD, May 31, 1887.

EVERY one knows that Oxford in the May term is besieged and taken by the ladies. So it is this year, only more so. "The Christians to the lionesses," as an Oxford wit said some years ago. This month no mention shall be made of lectures or examinations. Boards of studies and professors' chairs give way to temporary ball-rooms. Only the clamor for tickets, the shouts of applause at high jumps and long races, are heard in the land. The daily cricket match, the daily boat-race, in which the submissive slave strains every nerve at oar or on tow-path to pander to the barbaric taste of his conqueror, are the occupation of the precious hours. Motley is the only wear, and a very pretty costume it is.

One of the most distinguished colleges is given up to musical orgies three nights in the week. The last outbreak of dementia is a cantata in which the follies of Oxford are set forth, solemnly and with intent, it is said, to serious criticism, under the form and title of a well-known nursery rhyme; the hero-undergraduate being a certain self-willed frog who is led astray by a felon rat with black legs, and the charms of a too-seductive mouse, while the master of the college watches the downward progress of his disciple with dismay, and sighs over it, under the time-honored name of Mr. Anthony Rowley. Whom the gods have doomed they first dement. All this is done to please the ladies, who are now masters of Oxford. And so it has been found necessary by the obsequious slaves to provide amusement of another kind for those of their masters who are "easily firsts" in the class lists. A Greek play is being acted at the new theatre, that bone of contention among the University authorities. Even those who were most averse to the innovation have lowered their flag to the attractions of the new announcement. The performance of "Alcestis," with a real lady in the title-rôle, is running a neck-and-neck race with the boats this week. It is pleasant to think how rapidly the knowledge of Greek has spread among the dominant race—to judge by the proportion of ladies to the rest of the audience; it must be a great encouragement to the promoters of the higher education of women. This is probably the last chance for the classics. Next year the great masterpieces of the Slavo-Lettic drama will occupy the University stage, for by that time the new school will have triumphantly established the right of this widely known and much-admired language to supersede the inferior forms of speech which are properly called dead. Who, indeed, could have thought that the old classical dog had so much life in him? This is doubtless the last bone that will be thrown to him. No wonder the old fogies whose brains have been addled on Latin and Greek are chuckling over this their last morsel. Next year Oxford will do better; for the present we must put up with Euripides.

The play has been admirably put on the stage. It does great credit to all concerned, and specially to Mr. Mackinnon, the stage-manager. Those who are new to such things cannot fail to be greatly fascinated by the stately chorus, beautifully draped in harmonious colors, moving with solemn rhythmic motion as it is swayed by the successive emotions of pity, wonder, and reverence of the gods. This dramatizing of the feelings of the spectator is strange to us moderns, and very impressive in its fascination. Some of the music is extremely beautiful—there might well have been more of it. It seems scarcely fitting that when all that the chorus has to say is lyrical, some of it should be spoken. The fresh young cultivated voices, rising quaintly from the old men's bearded lips, full of rich pure tone, are delicious to the ear.

In the centre of the upper stage the curtain is drawn aside and discovers the figure of the Apollo Belvedere, in the full blaze of light, an admirable contrast to the next apparition, when, from clouds which it would be better not to call steam, is evolved the striking figure of Death, all swathed in mazy films of ashen drapery—a figure which brings the Fates of Michael Angelo forcibly to mind. But the main interest of the audience is centred on the expectation of the next scene, when the curtain is raised again to usher in the dying Alcestis, attended by her ladies and the children, and supported by Admetus. She staggers forward, now and then anchoring on Admetus's shoulder, now trying to advance along the stage, till she finally sinks into a seat. The horror of death, which she sees from time to time approaching, is upon her; faintness and pain overcome her.

If this be the true conception of the part, it is admirably done. Her self-pity, her physical sufferings, are powerfully expressed. It is not easy to understand why she has consented to such a sacrifice, when for the object of the sacrifice she appears to feel so little affection. Miss Harrison is a scholar, and other scholars uphold her in her conception, this far at least, that the modern spirit of voluntary devotion for a beloved object would be out of place. Alcestis had to do it, and did not like doing it. But the realistic display of physical suffering and bodily weakness is surely contrary to the poetic feeling of the Greeks, whose regard for beauty required that all sorrow and suffering should be idealized. It might be hypercritical, perhaps, to complain that in fondling the children Miss Harrison failed to be maternal. Her gestures, though they have much dramatic propriety, sacrifice a little too much to the determination never to conceal her face from the spectator. Yet the actress has a profoundly impressive personality, and to impose this on the audience must be held a proof of considerable dramatic power. It is difficult to understand why she should always speak in falsetto, when it is well known that she possesses a contralto voice of much sweetness and a wide range of tone.

When at last Heracles brings her back to Admetus, after wrestling with Death on her behalf, the untutored spectator is appalled at the terrible appearance Alcestis assumes—a huddled corpse, with glassy eyes and half-opened mouth, which has of life nothing but the power of walking; hands and arms limp and incapable of motion. The eyes have no speculation in them even when they rest on Admetus. She is polluted by contact with the corruption of the grave, and, till the three days of purification are past, the veil which wraps the dead in mystery must not be torn aside. This is strong meat to the ignorant modern, and probably our judgment is at fault in this: we mistake the real moral of the play. It is not Alcestis's self-sacrifice, but the duty of hospitality under the most adverse circumstances, which Euripides wishes to inculcate. Admetus would not refuse to admit Heracles as his guest, though his wife was just dead. As a reward, his wife is restored to him. In almost the last line of the play, Admetus again asks Heracles to dinner.

THE DUOMO OF FLORENCE.

FLORENCE, May 22, 1887.

THE Church of Sta. Maria del Fiore is unique among the monuments of ecclesiastical architecture in the world, not only for its design, which makes it, in my opinion, the most majestic of all the Italian cathedrals, but for its being the expression of the taste and resolution of the people of Florence—built during the periods of freedom between 1298 and 1887, extending over nearly six hundred years, no one architect having done more than contribute a single feature to the whole as it now stands; and it is probably unique in this fact, too, that it is a harmonized result of so many masters in such widely separated epochs of construction.

In a former letter on Orvieto I mentioned the fact that Arnolfo was called from that city to build for Florence, and among the noble works which he began there he laid in 1296 the cornerstone of a new church under the dedication of Sta. Reparata; the old one, existing in 490, enlarged in 689, not being sufficiently large and fine for so great and rich a city as Florence, then fresh from the victory over the Grandi. The work seems to have been pushed on with great vigor for that day, but in 1310 the architect, Arnolfo, died (this, it will be remembered, was the year that Maitani was called to Orvieto), and the work flagged until 1331, when the guild of woolworkers was charged with the continuance of it, and a tax was laid to furnish funds. In 1334 Giotto was made the chief architect, and designed at least the Campanile; but what part he had in the church we are not informed; as he died two years later, he could not have carried the construction of the church itself far.

In 1355 a commission was appointed to resume the work. What part of it was then complete it is possible to decide only by examination of the cathedral, and this conjecturally as to what was of the design of Arnolfo. The walls of the body of the church have the evidences of three designers. From the façade back to the second piers on each side the work is clearly of the earliest epoch of the construction, pure thirteenth-century Gothic, and was of a lower plan than the present church. It contains three Gothic windows. There is a cornice which runs to the second pier and there stops; beyond this the wall rises several feet before it comes to the cornice, and the style of the cornice changes. But there is a superstructure of wall above the cornice on the older part which brings it to the level of the new, and then the cornice runs over the whole in the same style, while in the wall which lies beyond the second pier, between it and the chapels, there are two windows higher than the three in front of them, and of a style distinctly later. The second side door, called of Andrea Pisano, is in this portion, and is different in its sculpture from the first, which comes in that part of the wall which I consider the earlier. The chapels did not exist then, and were made the subject of a competition or competitions in 1355–56–57. The church designed by Arnolfo was not large enough for the growing ambition of the Florentines, and they decided to enlarge it, "increasing it at the rear," by fifty braccie (78 feet circa); and in the year 1357 a grand council of citizens, architects, and painters decided on the dimensions of the new church. The width it was decided not to increase. The corner-stone of the first column towards the Campanile was laid with great ceremony the 5th of August, 1357, the architects called in to consult and design being Francesco Talenti, Orcagna, and Ghini, to mention only the chief.

Now, putting documents and building together, I conclude that the sides of the church, as far as the second pier and up to the first and partial cornice, was the work of Arnolfo and in accordance with his plan, which comprehended a smaller church, shorter and less imposing in the octagon, but probably containing the germ of the present design—but the germ only, for we find in the documents the working out of the present design in detail subsequently to the appointment of Talenti, i. e., forty-seven years after the death of Arnolfo. The wall of the façade was probably carried up to its original plan, so that the front of the church was substantially complete as to the outer walls, but, as the columns of the nave were not yet built, the elongation alone was possible without the destruction of good work. The lengthening of the church requiring greater height, the wall already completed was added to, and thus we have the double cornice as far as the second external pier. The windows in the inside of the church for this same portion do not correspond with the outer windows, so that they are both blind windows, inside and out. The reason of this is that, as the wall was higher than originally intended, it had to be strengthened inside; and as the new lengthening of the nave required a different distribution of the inside piers, which do not coincide with the outer, the old windows are obstructed by the inner wall. One of the outside windows comes directly over one of the inner piers. All this seems to me to be accounted for only by the supposition that the part of the church before the second pier was the work of Arnolfo; and as it contains admirable ornament in the doors and windows, and involved great expense, they decided to work it in. The columns were yet to be built, but originally they intended to have three arches, and afterwards decided to have four; the front being shorter than the others, for some reason I have not been able to conjecture.

The body of the church so carried on by Talenti, with continual competition of models and commissions to choose, made progress, and in 1407 the central tribune, with its chapels five, was finished. In 1419 the walls of the octagon were complete and ready for the vault—it is an eight-ribbed octagonal vault, and not a dome, as it is ordinarily called—and here came the deus ex machina, Brunelleschi, when the commission which had carried the church so far were beyond their wits to contrive a way to build the roof of their octagon, not having timber enough to build a staging from the ground up to that height, and not knowing how otherwise to do it till Brunelleschi appeared.

Now, the gradual development of the church is marked by a change in the style of the exterior, the feeling of the early Renaissance coming on slowly, and being triumphant in the cornice above the wall of the nave, and in the little external tribunes, like pilgrims' scallop shells, all set round the great vault. The lantern, which was Brunelleschi's, is pure Renaissance, the external decoration, the panelling of white marble and green with bands of red, being kept in accordance with the design of Arnolfo throughout. That the system of ornamentation and the design, with the example, was of Arnolfo, is indicated again by the fact that, in the Campanile (of which we have sufficient evidence that the design and early work were by Giotto himself), the colors are changed, and red takes the place of the dark green, almost black, of the body of the church. This was in accordance with Giotto's instinct as a colorist, while the green instead of the red in the church is the scheme of the Baptistery, which was the work of Arnolfo; and the scheme of Giotto is so evidently the superior that I can hardly believe that, with the Campanile before them, the later builders would have adopted the green and white.

The records are silent with regard to the existence of any façade of Santa Maria del Fiore contemporary with Arnolfo. De Fabris, in his work preparatory to the new façade, discovered a piece of incrustation analogous to that on the church, of about one square metre in extent, with certain other fragments about the doorways, indicating that a façade did exist commenced at least by Arnolfo. But that a Gothic façade was carried to a certain stage of completion during the period of the labors of Arnolfo or his immediate successors, is unquestionable, a reminiscence of it still remaining in a sixteenth-century drawing by Boccetti, and in a lunette painted by him in the first cloister of Saint Mark's. Rondinelli has left a description of it as follows:

"There was a façade with Gothic (tedesca) architecture, carried about half-way up, all full of beautiful niches destined for statues, which in later times they put into position. Part were by the famous Donatello, and part by other sculptors, worked with art, beautifully arranged and divided. One saw some chapels among them, divided by most beautiful and varied columns—some smooth and others twisted, so that the variety of marble and of porphyries and the diversity of the statues and columns gave it a very rich appearance, and filled the sight of the spectator with majesty."

Then follows a detailed description of the façade as far as finished, and a list of the statues contained in it. He next goes on to describe the destruction of the façade, accomplished in 1587 by the classicists, who regarded the Gothic as barbarous and unworthy of their time. He says:

"There was no piece of marble which was taken out whole—even columns were broken; which was, in truth, a pitiful spectacle, principally for the ruin of the façade, and then for the breaking of those beautiful marbles and porphyries, worked with so much care that, if they had been taken out entire, they would have served for ornament to many other places, with utility for the works, which would have been able to sell them for some hundreds of scudi."

In 1688 a temporary façade was added to the church on occasion of the marriage of Prince Ferdinand de' Medici, son of Cosimo the Third and of Princess Violante of Bavaria. This had been preceded in 1515 by a painted façade executed by Andrea del Sarto, on a wooden mask, after a design by Sansovino. In 1589 there was another sham façade of canvas, with statues of stucco and canvas, portions of which remained till 1841. In 1661 another, also on canvas, was executed. That of 1688, being of masonry covered with intonaco (plaster) and painted according to designs by Ercole Graziani, remained, more or less damaged, until the commencement of the present work. New projects for the restoration were being brought forward from 1823 until 1859. The present design is the result of competitions which continued until 1867, when the final decision of the commission accorded it to De Fabris.

The work as uncovered May 12 must be pronounced on the whole a splendid success, and worthy of the church which it completes. Its radical fault, that it is neither basilical nor tricuspidal, is due to the fact that De Fabris designed it as tricuspidal, but was compelled by the general force of public opinion to leave out the minor cuspids after the façade had been carried up to the point of preparation for them, leaving a central gable with square shoulders, corresponding neither with the pitch of the roof nor with the vault of the aisle. To my own taste it is better than if the cuspids had been added, but it remains a compromise. There is a slight crudity in the general color effect, and most critics complain of the violence of the contrast between the white and deep green, almost black; but time will remedy this by toning the white and graying the green. The general effect of the sculpture is admirable, hardly surpassed by anything in Gothic architecture. The central door, especially, is pronounced by Prof. Babcock, a competent critic, certainly one of the most perfect things of its kind in the range of Gothic architecture. The general plan of decoration of the façade is in accordance with similar works of Tuscan Gothic. Over the great door in the tympanum is seated the Madonna, and all the figures in the façade form part of one general design, in which all the personages of the Old and New Testament, and figures symbolical of letters, fine arts, useful arts, science, works of beneficence, figures illustrative of the Commune of Florence and of the church, render honor to the Madonna. An upper line of half figures represent historical personages of the epoch in which the church was constructed; and across the entire façade, immediately under the cornice, the twelve Apostles stand in niches—six for the nave and three for each aisle—while in niches on the four piers, on a level with the tympanums of the smaller doorways, are four seated Bishops. These statues are all executed by the leading Italian sculptors of the day, larger than life, being awarded in competitions, and paid only for the cost of the marble and workmanship. As single statues, they represent the best qualities of modern Italian sculpture, but they agree in one notable defect as members of an architectural whole, viz., not being calculated for the position they are seen in, so that they seem squat in the fore-shortening.

Decorative details are borrowed from the old work to a great extent, and the chromatic and sculpturesque ornamentation throughout as closely as possible follows that in the body of the church. The tympanums and spaces over the doorway are filled with mosaics designed by leading Italian painters and executed by the Murano company. Not the least noteworthy fact, and illustrative of the present condition of art in Italy, is the cost of the work, which, extending over a period of fifteen years, involved the expense of only one million francs—two hundred thousand francs less than the original estimate. There are over thirty full-length statues, and nearly as many bas-reliefs and half figures.

THE GOETHE SOCIETY.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Referring to the note in No. 1145 of the Nation, permit me to remind your readers that by the Weimar Committee I was appointed agent of the Goethe Society for the United States, and that, on payment of $3.25, I can issue members' certificates and supply the publications of the Society, duty paid and free of all forwarding charges to members in this country, as I do now to some thirty members here. If this accommodation stands in the way of keeping alive the public sentiment against the barbarous tariff on books, it saves members the trouble of direct application and remittance and the possible loss of mailed matter, and is a means of delivering the valuable books issued by the Society in a fitter condition than mail transportation allows of.

Respectfully, Ernst Lemcke
(B. Westermann & Co.).

THE BEVERLY INCIDENT ONCE MORE.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: For the statements of my note of last week (save as to the tax estimate) I can only refer your Beverly correspondent to the official reports of the two committees of the Legislature, and the testimony before them as printed and published.

As to the tax estimate, I have not yet met a summer resident who expected a lower tax rate. If a fair adjustment of the existing debt was not provided by this year's bill, it should be in next year's.

If it is true, as your correspondent alleges, that this year's vote was due to the power of money alone, the bill this year certainly met a deserved fate. Observer.

HOW TO KEEP AN INN.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I am a woman, and I have grievances that I appeal to you to make known as the first step towards redress.

I have had occasion this last week to be for several days in some of the smaller towns, and my soul has been stirred within me by the utter discomfort of the hotels. As a practical woman, accustomed to keep house on a moderate income, I have been considering in what ways the hotels and the hotel service may be changed so as to give more comfort with no greater outlay. Why are the ceilings of the rooms so high? No room can seem comfortable when its length, breadth, and height are equal. If the ceilings were lower, it would be possible to reach the gas burners to regulate the supply of gas, and the light would also fall better on the book or sewing when it is needed. The windows, also, would be more manageable; it would be possible to lower the upper sash at night when ventilation is needed. The windows need sash-curtains across the lower half to secure privacy from over-looking windows, but they should never have thick draperies that will hold the odor of the possible cigar of the previous occupant.

Do statistics show that most travellers in America take private parlors? and if they do, why are there so many parlors that have been turned into bedrooms? I object to sleeping on a pine cot in one corner of a large salon furnished in damask or plush. I object still more to sleeping in a bed that has been turned up into a bookcase during the day. Hotel beds at the best are not aired enough. I protest against their being hermetically sealed except when I am in them. Nor do I like to wash at what looks like a writing-desk, and arrange my hair at an étagère. I am not a sham, but I feel like one when I emerge from such a pretentious, comfortless room; and the two or three mirrors that reflect my mortification and disgust are an aggravation instead of a consolation.

Why is not the table linen better, and better looked after? It is disgusting to have a cloth badly ironed, and covered with spots of iron mould. You view your coffee and eggs with a prejudiced mind when you have been obliged to reject two napkins that have been brought to you as clean, but that are stained and torn and only half dried. Why is there no competent housekeeper to see that things are taken care of? No gorgeousness of frieze and cornice in paper reconciles one to a grate that is red with rust; nor does a carpet made more expensive by a border blind your eyes to the fact that it is not swept often enough.

If a town is small, let it have a small, plainly-furnished, comfortable inn, but let it be well looked after. Such inns are to be found in small towns in England—why not here? I am American to the core, and I have enough respect for American men and women, whether they work in shops, travel for commercial houses, or live on the incomes coming from the labors of their ancestors, to think that they would choose comfort instead of show, and neatness instead of tawdriness.

What I therefore demand, and shall continue to demand, is, that the inn or hotel shall be proportionate to the size of the village or town. If the landlord's income is small, don't force on him a house too large. Spend less for furnishing the house, and more for keeping it clean. Leave off the mirrors unless you are sure the proprietor and servants intend to live up to them. Make the ceilings lower. Build more chimneys and put open grates in them. Have halls wider and better lighted. Provide a closet of good size for each room; and the carpenter should be made to understand that women are not six feet tall, and that it tires them to reach far above their heads for a shelf or a peg. Provide some place for women to write letters; and when it is sufficiently cool for an open fire in the smoking-room, I assert it is cool enough for such a fire in the writing-room. Have simpler curtains and carpets, but see that they are kept clean. Have simpler furniture, and let it be cane-seated, instead of something that will hold dust and make rooms stuffy. Call a bed a bed and make it look like one. Go back to washstands instead of set-bowls in dark closets; but if there is a set-bowl, provide a receptacle for the water one uses for one's teeth. Have a table in each room large enough to write at and to hold a few books. Have a housekeeper to see that the maids attend to their work, and that the towels, tablecloths, and napkins are of better quality and kept in better condition. See that there is less show and more comfort. Make it possible, in short, to "take one's ease in one's inn."—Very sincerely,

M. N. S.

Notes.

J. B. Lippincott Co. have nearly ready 'Nineteenth Century Sense: The Paradox of Spiritualism,' by "John Darby" (Dr. James E. Garretson); and 'Thekla,' a story of Viennese musical life, by William Armstrong.

A 'New High-School Music Reader,' by Charles E. Whiting of Boston, is in the press of D. C. Heath & Co.

Ginn & Co. announce 'The Eastern Nations and Greece,' by P. V. N. Myers, President of Belmont College, being Part i. of an Ancient History for Colleges and High Schools. Part ii., 'Rome,' will be from the pen of an equally competent scholar, Prof. W. F. Allen of the University of Wisconsin. Both parts will be illustrated and furnished with colored maps, and be bound together or sold separately. The same firm will publish during the summer a thoroughly revised edition of Dr. Albert S. Cook's translation of Sievers's 'Grammar of Old English,' and, later, Zupitza's 'Old and Middle-English Reader,' translated by Prof. G. E. MacLean of the University of Minnesota.

The Scribners will at once put their imprint on Marion Harland's 'Judith: a Chronicle of Old Virginia,' which they have lately acquired.

The Anti-Rent Riots of New York will be the theme of the second number of the series of monographs on Political Economy and Public Law, edited by Prof. E. J. James of the University of Pennsylvania. The subject has been investigated by Mr. E. P. Cheyney, Instructor of History in the institution just named.

A German publisher in Cologne announces a translation of the 'Life of Leo XIII.,' by Dr. B. O'Reilly of this city, in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of the Pope's admission to the priesthood. There are also in the press French, Dutch, Italian, and Spanish translations of this work.

On condition of taking the second volume of I. G. Icazbalceta's 'Bibliografia Mexicana del siglo xvi.,' or a complete bibliography of books printed in Mexico in the sixteenth century, the first is now to be had through B. Westermann & Co. The edition is limited. Numerous titles, etc., are reproduced in facsimile.

We should think that Del Mar's 'Classified Business Directory of Mexico, Central and South America, Cuba and Porto Rico' (New York: Spanish-American Commercial Company), would be of great use to those engaged in or contemplating trade with Spanish America. Certainly it has been compiled with industry and thoroughness, and, with the exception of a few misspelled names, is highly accurate, so far as we are able to test it. Its English, too, is on the whole excellent, though an occasional turn of phrase, such as "all the American mercantile enterprises which have advented in those countries" (p. 365), betrays the writer's foreign birth. The book is not without instruction for the general reader, also, since it shows conclusively (all the more conclusively for doing it indirectly) that the fatal barrier to trade with South America is our tariff. After all the reasons given for the astonishing smallness of the commerce of the United States in its natural market—lack of knowledge on the part of American exporters, lack of enterprise, failure to cater to the native taste, want of direct steamship lines—the author has to acknowledge, believer in the policy of protection that he professes to be, that, if they were all absent, our system of duties would suffice to make a South American trade next to impossible.

The Oxford Historical Society is exhibiting a remarkable degree of enlightened zeal and industry in its publications. It is only three years old, and we have its sixth volume before us, and one not inferior to any of its predecessors in value and interest ('Magdalen College and King James II., 1686-1688. A series of documents collected and edited by the Rev. J. R. Bloxam, D.D.' Oxford: The Clarendon Press). It is a bi-centenary, devoted to the famous Magdalen College case, exactly two hundred years ago. A well-written introduction, of thirty pages, by Rev. H. R. Bramley, gives a brief and clear history of the case, and the rest of the volume is filled with the three hundred and eleven documents, together with index and such other explanatory matter as is found desirable. It is a model of serviceable historical work, and will be indispensable to all students of the English Revolution, and especially of the interesting episode of which it treats.

Of the miscellaneous papers that make up the sixth volume of the Virginia Historical Collections—a handsome product of the Richmond press—the most curious is the charter of the Royal African Company, 1672, whose traffic was in slaves, and among whose incorporators were the Duke of York; Prince Rupert; Anthony, Earl of Shaftesbury, Sir George Carteret, Ferdinando Gorges, and several ladies—Mrs. Dorcas Birkhead, Dame Priscilla Ryder, etc. This document is introduced by a disappointing note by Mr. R. A. Brock, who endeavors to relieve Virginia of the odium of establishing slavery on her own soil, but ends by praising her manufacture of African savages into (Liberian) Christians. This is as antiquated as the colonization authority on which he relies for the growth of the anti-slavery sentiment at the North. The Gilmer papers, military and political, belong to the Revolutionary period, and have much local and some general interest. The orderly-book of Capt. George Stubblefield's company during four months of 1776; the history of the Merrimac (alias Virginia) in the civil war; and a memorial of the Federal prison on Johnson's Island, Lake Erie, 1862-64, fill out the volume, and give it a decided value.

Mrs. Charles D. Deshler of New Brunswick, one of the leading historians of New Jersey, has made public for the first time an interesting series of letters, parts of correspondence between four Newark lads, John Croes, Ashbel Green, Alexander C. Macwhorter, and Zadock Squier. The correspondence is between three of them who went to Princeton College, then known as Nassau Hall, in 1782, and Croes, who remained in Newark. They are interesting not only for their graphic picture of college life one hundred years ago, but because of the prominence three of the young men afterward reached. Ashbel Green, the grandfather of Governor Green, became President of Princeton College; John Croes was the first Episcopal Bishop of New Jersey; and Alex. C. Macwhorter became one of the most prominent New Jersey lawyers, and, as one of the founders of the Institutio Legalis, exerted a wholesome influence on his successors.

Dr. Marvin R. Vincent, in his 'Word Studies in the New Testament' (Charles Scribner's Sons), has attempted to combine in one a sort of enlarged Trench, a reduced lexicon, a condensed concordance, and snatches of a commentary. His success in producing a readable compound has been considerable, and his patient use of the best authorities, and high degree of accuracy, it is pleasant to note. If he sometimes errs in pressing classic usage as interpretative of New Testament Greek, he does it in good company. Trench set that fashion too brilliantly to be superseded speedily, though the best scholarship has shown, we think, the Septuagint to be the true dictionary of the New Testament. We must doubt if Dr. Vincent will succeed in his declared aim of giving to readers ignorant of Greek a sense of the force of Greek idioms, tenses, word-metaphors, etc. Many such, at least, he will bewilder and mislead as much as he will enlighten; in fact, we very much fear that his book will cause to reappear in certain pulpits those allusions to "the exact force of the original" which the Revision bade fair to exterminate.

Dr. F. H. A. Scrivener has just issued from the Cambridge (England) press a beautiful third edition of his well-known 'Novum Testamentum Textûs Stephanici, A. D. 1550,' in which, in addition to the various readings of the second edition (1876), are inserted those of Westcott and Hort, and of the Revisers of 1881, prepared by Mr. W. F. Shilleto, A.M. While making this further concession to the progress of textual criticism, Dr. Scrivener characterizes the text of the Revisers as "Westcott-Hortii placitis forsan nimis arcte consanguineum," and that of Westcott and Hort as "splendidum peccatum, non κτῆμα εἰς ἀεί"; and he thinks that, while following Lachmann's rules, they have erred from the truth even further than Lachmann himself. One who has devoted himself for fifty years to the study of the text of the New Testament, has earned the right to express his opinion, but the world moves and revolutions never go backwards. Dr. Scrivener has also added to the inner margin of this edition the numbers of the Ammonian sections and Eusebian canons, a table of which is prefixed, and to the outer margin a copious list of parallel passages. In other respects the pages correspond exactly to those of the second edition, which is a convenience to the student.

The attention of those interested in coöperative schemes may be called to 'Social Solutions' (Lovell Co.), a translation of the work of M. Godin, the founder of the celebrated Familistère at Guise. The mixture of wild theory with practical sense is not unprecedented, and it is to be found in this volume. Those who have the patience to rake off the chaff will be rewarded by the discovery of a good deal that is valuable regarding the construction and management of a "Palace of Industry."

The book of an invalid is possibly not the best reading for invalids, but in Fannie Nichols Benjamin's 'Sunny Side of Shadow' (Boston: Ticknor & Co.), there is an attempt to brighten the hours of convalescence by telling the reveries of the author in that state. It deals much in excellent quotation, and there is a mild purity in its spirit which wins the consideration of the reader.

'An Index to the Works of Shakspere, Giving references, by topics, to notable passages and significant expressions; brief histories of the plays; geographical names, and historical incidents; mention of all characters, and sketches of important ones; together with explanations of allusions and obscure and obsolete words and phrases,' by Evangeline M. O'Connor (D. Appleton & Co.), is a volume completely described by its title. It is a compilation, from obvious sources, of much information in regard to the plays and cognate subjects, and contains mention of most things for which any ordinary reader would have occasion to consult a book of reference about Shakspere. But its treatment of these topics is inadequate. It is a very incomplete concordance and dictionary; it contains a few quotations from Coleridge, Dowden, Gervinus, etc., in respect to the leading characters; and altogether is a scattering compendium. Its notes, it must be added, are slight and touch only the surface of Shakspere literature; greater fulness would have swelled the volume indefinitely. Scholars and special students have no need of it; but school libraries and others which cannot afford the more expensive works that cover the ground scientifically and thoroughly, will find this convenient, well-printed, and useful.

The 'Shakespeare-Bibliographie, 1885 und 1886,' by Albert Cohen, just issued, is a separately printed portion of the twenty-second volume of the Shakespeare-Jahrbuch, the organ of the German Shakspere Society. Its compiler shows the same extraordinary diligence and skill in collecting the materials for his work from the most varied sources as in his former issues. The larger part of the fifty pages is, of course, taken up with English and American titles. The veteran scholar, Mr. Halliwell-Phillipps, is credited with eleven publications, and the contents of volumes two and three of Shakespeariana are given, as well as articles appearing in papers like the Gazette, Lawrence, Kansas. From the ten pages given to Germany, it is evident that her scholars still preserve their interest in the study of the English dramatist. The most curious part of the bibliography is the page devoted to Icelandic translations, made within the past few years, of four of the plays, "Hamlet," "King Lear," "Macbeth," "Othello," and two of the "Tempest," together with selections from three others. There is only one Russian translation, but there are four in Greek. The final entry is the most interesting of all, "The Two Gentlemen of Verona, translated into Singhalese, and arranged for the native stage by the insertion of verses to be sung in chorus. Ceylon? 1884 or 1885."

A foreign observer may well believe that the year 1886, commemorated in the Annual Register just published (London: Rivingtons), marks for Great Britain the beginning of the greatest constitutional revolution of the century. The incoming of the Gladstone Ministry and its downfall on the Irish question were the outward incidents of the change which we cannot yet forecast. As usual, in this Register, non-British countries are summarily treated, with much the effect that comes of half closing one's eyes on a landscape, or of the camera image. The United States is thus reduced to President Cleveland's messages, the fisheries dispute, the Cutting affair with Mexico, the strikes and the Anarchist riot in Chicago, the Henry George and Roosevelt candidacies. The Register presents its customary Chronicle or diary of public events for the year; its review of literature, science, and art; and its necrology. No state documents and no causes célèbres are put on record. The volume extends an invaluable series.

Five more numbers in the pocket "National Library," edited by Prof. Henry Morley (Cassell), include Coventry Patmore's 'Angel in the House,' De Quincey's 'Murder as a Fine Art, and English Mail-Coach,' 'Trips to the Moon' (Dr. Thomas Francklin's translation from the Greek of Lucian), the second volume of White's 'Selborne,' and another batch of Plutarch's Lives—Cato the Younger, Agis, Cleomenes, the Gracchi.

The last pair of the six volumes of the Riverside edition of Robert Browning's Works—so contrived, by the way, that each volume can be had separately, and the order of the set is indicated only within—combines lyrics and dramatic idyls, translation and transcription from the Greek, the French "Red Cotton Night-Cap Country," the Italian "Pacchiarotto," the Oriental "Ferishtah's Fancies," the cosmopolitan "Parleyings with Certain People of Importance in Their Day," and finally some fragments that have hitherto escaped collection. In a word, these two volumes show all sides of a poet who, by dramatic instinct, prefers blank verse to rhyme, and ruggedness to limpidity. Here he challenges in all ways those who hold him in light esteem because, as he says in "The Inn Album,"

> "he neglects the form:
> But ah, the sense, ye gods! the weighty sense."

Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin & Co., in this handsome American edition, have not "neglected the form."

The contents of the first volume of Scribner's Magazine are surely fresh in the minds of our readers. Gov. Washburne's "Siege and Commune of Paris," the French diary of Gouverneur Morris, J. C. Ropes's portrait-studies of Napoleon and Cæsar, Thackeray's inedited letters, Prof. Shaler's Earth and North American Forests, are some of the successes which may be recalled here, without prejudice to divers other contributions of great merit and interest. The illustrations are of a high order. The binding has been very happily conceived and executed.

'Arithmetic in Primary and Grammar Schools' (Boston: Damrell & Upham) is the title of a pamphlet containing the remarks made recently on this subject by Gen. F. A. Walker in the Boston School Committee. He takes vigorous exception both to the amount of time given to the study by the younger scholars, and also to the character of much of the teaching. This, he holds, "is largely made up of exercises which are not exercises in arithmetic at all, or principally, but are exercises in logic," and fitted only for maturer minds. He fortifies his position by quoting similar views on this point by several prominent educators.

Volume vi. of the fourth edition of Meyer's Konversations-Lexikon (New York: Westermann) is now completed, and the seventh volume has advanced to the article Glass, one of the many, industrial and economic, which are carefully prepared for this standard work of reference. France, Florence, and Frankfort-on-the-Main are the leading geographical articles, all accompanied by maps. Under the first there is a fairly objective estimate of the French character, a particular account of the French military establishment, and a full history of the Third Republic, coming down to Boulanger's push to the front. The chapters on French literature and language are also noticeable. In biography, Goethe leads out of sight with more than seventeen pages, and one may learn what is needful of the Goethe Museum and Gesellschaft. Gladstone is allowed two and a half pages. Froude is justly estimated. American biographies are usually executed with discernment, as in the case of Fillmore and Grant. Garfield's claims as a Presidential reformer are decidedly overrated. Under Franklin, one finds mention of the newest edition of his works—Mr. Bigelow's. The woman question fills four pages; but neither the movement in England nor that in the United States has been rightly grasped. Especially is the independent genesis of the latter quite disregarded. It is erroneously asserted that several States have granted the suffrage to women.

From the same firm come Parts 14–17 of the 'Geschichte der Deutschen Kunst,' which conclude the two departments of architecture and statuary (Plastik). The series is now about two-thirds finished, wood and metal engraving having yet to be treated of, and promising to furnish as beautiful an array of illustrations as have distinguished the chapters on painting, the builder's and the sculptor's art. Of the Allgemeine Naturkunde, Westermann & Co. send us Parts 73–82, which deal with plant-life. Dr. Kerner von Maxilaun of the University of Vienna is the author of this section, and his name is a guarantee of high quality in the text. The chromo illustrations are partly from water-color sketches made by naturalists, and these have a decided charm. As usual, woodcuts in great number are interspersed with the letter-press.

An interesting "epoch study" of the Empress Elizabeth Petrovna, forming a part of the unfinished History of Russia by N. I. Kostomaroff, has just been published from his posthumous papers.

Horner's large etching of Broadway north from Canal Street in 1836 is well known to all who busy themselves with the pictorial antiquities of this city, and has often been copied by photographic reduction. Messrs. James A. Webb & Son, 165 Pearl Street, merchants for whom the print has a special interest, have had it reproduced at scale in facsimile, and from them we receive a copy. The intervening half century has spared hardly a vestige of the house depicted in this plate, which abounds, besides, in curiosities of vehicles, dress, and customs now alike extinct—such as a canvas-covered ice-cart on two wheels; the Greenwich and Wall St. 'bus; a wood-sawyer cumbering the street with his logs and sawhorses, etc.

—The first number of the 'Battles and Leaders of the Civil War' (The Century Co.) shows how a subscription book ought to be made. The De Vinne Press and the corps of artists who serve the Century have coöperated in producing a most inviting and beautiful reprint of the war papers which have had such vogue in that medium. It is something more than a reprint, as this instalment shows, for in the original series the Sumter episode was not discussed. Other similar gaps the editors, Messrs. R. U. Johnson and C. C. Buel, discovered when it became a question of making a connected whole of the contributions—Northern and Southern—to the magazine. These have accordingly been provided for, so that the purchaser of the work will get a complete military history of the war. This history, we need hardly say, is really "materials to serve," but not raw materials. The narrative of the actors, great and small, in the desperate struggle is thoroughly readable, and it can be read on both sides of Mason and Dixon's line without bitterness and even without feeling. The conception which gave birth to it was a happy one, and the widest circulation which this great pictorial record can have will be all to the common interest of the citizens of our reunited republic.

—The first edition of 'Shakespeare Outlines,' by Halliwell-Phillipps, was a thin volume. But its author has more divining power than any wielder of witch-hazel for detecting living fountains where others can see only a waterless desert. So the 'Outlines' have grown year by year till the fifth edition had 637 pages, and the sixth last year showed 784. The seventh edition, which came out the last week in May, is still sixty pages more ponderous. Yet Mr. Phillipps's pages never show those marks of easy writing which Sheridan declared with an oath to be hard reading. Regarding this last issue, he writes as follows to an American friend:

> "The last winter's work was about the hardest I have ever had. The brief annex to my 'Outlines' is the result of several months' incessant labor. The subjects newly considered are the Charlecote traditions and the poet's religious opinions, both requiring a careful study of the contemporary law. The statute law is, as a rule, easily interpreted, but it is most difficult in many cases to get at the practice of the ancient common law, and you would, I think, have been amused could you have seen me day after day imbedded amidst black-letter law-books, of which, fortunately, I have a large collection. You will perhaps remember that when you were last here at Hollingbury Copse, in November, 1884, seeing a deed with the autograph of Sir Thomas Lucy, the poet's Justice Shallow in 'Merry Wives.' This deed was without a seal. A few months ago, by a piece of great good fortune, I obtained a fine and perfect deed, not only with Sir Thomas Lucy's signature, but with a perfect example of the three-luces seal, a great curiosity that I am not a little proud of. The only other specimen, as I believe, to be found in private hands belongs to the Marquis of Bute."

—In the June Macmillan's the Rev. Canon Ainger has an interesting study of Coleridge's poem "Dejection," in which he finds some biographical matter. This ode originally appeared in the Morning Post of October 4, 1802, six months after it was written, and was afterwards revised and included in the 'Sibylline Leaves,' 1815. October 4, 1802, was the day of Wordsworth's marriage. There is among the Beaumont papers the earliest draft, which is addressed to "William"; in the second or Morning Post version "William" becomes "Edmund"; and in the 1815 volume "Edmund" is exchanged for the "Lady" whose existence is a poetic fiction. That

"Edmund" means Wordsworth is also made clear by a letter of Charles Lamb, who writes to Coleridge in Latin, which Canon Ainger freely renders—"I am awfully glad to receive your account of the marriage of Wordsworth (or perhaps I should rather say, of a certain Edmund of yours)." Furthermore, this earlier version contains definite and strong lines of friendship which are omitted from the ode as we now have it. It was at this time that Coleridge was coming to a perception of the power and effect of the opium habit, though he had not made his friends acquainted with this cause of his dejection. Canon Ainger goes on to argue that Wordsworth's poem upon the Leech Gatherer was his reply to this tribute and hopeless appeal of Coleridge; and though nothing very definite is shown, it is very likely that such was the case—certainly the stanzas have a remarkably apposite application to Coleridge's individual character and his circumstances. The identification of Wordsworth as the person whose nature really called out Coleridge's ode, the relation between the two poets thus illustrated, and Wordsworth's response to his friend, then entering into the dark shadow of his life, make up a moment of literary history well worth remembering and setting forth. It is not improbable that the divergence of the two friends in later life accounts for Coleridge's changes in the poem. A correspondent in the last Academy points out that Canon Ainger was anticipated by Prof. Brandl last year, in his (German) Life of Coleridge.

—The May number of Les Lettres et les Arts (Scribners) contains one of Pierre Loti's Oriental sketches similar to those which appeared a few months ago descriptive of Kioto and of Obock. This time he writes of a little territory on the Malabar coast, "Mahé des Indes," which has been French since 1727. With his usual felicities of expression, always surprisingly simple in language and in form, but representing extremely subtle and complicated impressions, he relates the three expeditions he made to the shore during the first three days of January, 1885, when his ship was anchored off the coast. The paper is accompanied by numerous sketches, by Félix Régamey, of this region of India and its people. As a writer, Loti does not lend himself to illustration by another; the vision he brings before the mind is itself too vivid and complete to allow it. There is an excellent paper by M. Gustave Masson, editor of Les Lettres et les Arts: "J.-L. Gérôme et son œuvre." The story of the artist and his work is well and simply told, and is illustrated by several of his most characteristic pictures. M. Germain Bapst writes with enthusiasm concerning "Le Bureau de Louis XV." now preserved in the Musée du Louvre, and which has been called "le plus beau monument du xviiie siècle." M. Bapst himself had the good fortune to discover in the National Archives the Memoir containing all the details of construction of this "merveille de l'ébénisterie française." "Aux Affaires étrangères," of which the first part is given in the present number, is a story so extremely cold and naked that it seems rather a collection of facts. The author, M. Paul Hervieu, is much inclined towards this very arid style of fiction, which seems to have great fascination for some of the most promising of the younger writers of the day, M. Guy de Maupassant at their head. But M. Hervieu has just written in the Revue des Deux Mondes (May 1 and 15) one of the most imaginative and dramatic of psychological stories, "L'Inconnu," which shows that his great powers of observation and of analysis may some time be put to more attractive uses than heretofore.

—Mr. G. B. Airy contributes to Nature (April 14, 1887) a communication "on the establishment of the Roman dominion in Southeast Britain," the special value of which consists in the identification of the localities of the campaigns of the Roman general Plautius. An interesting showing is that the Romans made a road from Camulodunum (Colchester) due west, "the great western road," by Marks Tey, Coggeshall, etc., to Stortford, and then afterwards the road to London, which is proved by the fact that the London road from Colchester branches off at a considerable angle at Marks Tey (this is shown by any good map of England). The latter part of the article, however, exhibits a curious confusion, in connecting the events of A. D. 60 (Boadicea's revolt) as directly following the occupation of the province in 43. Mr. Airy repeatedly mentions Plautius in connection with this revolt, although Dio Cassius, his authority, calls the governor Paulinus. He further attributes the revolt to exactions by Claudius, who had now been dead six years; what Dio Cassius says is that Claudius had given certain sums to the principal men of the Britains, and that now they were demanded by Catus (not Calus) the procurator. Mr. Airy questions the statement of Dio that the governor was absent in Μῶνα (Anglesea), as it is "very improbable that, in such a state of affairs, Plautius [Paulinus] would have gone, by a difficult march, to such a distance." Tacitus, however, in his nearly contemporary account (in his life of Agricola), twice mentions Paulinus's expedition against the island of Mona (chaps. xiv and xviii) as caused by its giving aid to his enemies—exactly the reason why Cæsar invaded Britain itself, B. C. 55.

—Count L. N. Tolstoi's interest in the education of the people and the production of suitable literature for their use has led him to try his powers in a new field, that of dramatic writing. The result cannot fail to amaze those who have the courage to brave the peculiarities of language and subject. How far it may answer its purpose and inculcate good morals in the peasants, remains to be seen. The title is, "The Kingdom of Darkness; or, Stick in a Claw and the whole Bird will Perish." In accordance with the author's theory, announced in a previous work, that the peasant always talks good Russian, while the cultivated man does not, he has couched his drama in language which is as unpleasant to read, and, it is safe to say, as far removed from refinement, as any author of note ever indulged in. The dialect is so rough, the commonest words so distorted, the expressions so coarse, that there would be but little pleasure in reading it, even if the plot were less intolerably repulsive than it is. Blood-curdling is the only fitting term to apply to it. The actors are all peasants; the chief ones are an old, wealthy, and sickly muzhik, his sixteen-year-old daughter by his first wife, his second wife and her daughter, aged ten, his hired man, the young fellow's parents, and an orphan girl of twenty-two. The action is extremely slight, mostly consisting in the crawling on and off the oven by several of the characters. One of the exceptions proves that the author actually expected his drama to be produced on the boards. A stage direction orders that Nikita, the young hired man, shall, "if possible, enter on horseback." "CEdipus in the village" is what a Russian critic calls this drama. There was some thought of putting it on the stage in St. Petersburg, but at the preliminary reading the actors refused to undertake it, and it has now been officially prohibited.

—M. Hector Pessard, formerly directeur of the National, and, since the change of politics of that paper, of the Petite République Française, has just published in a volume the very interesting articles which have appeared in recent numbers of the Revue Bleue, under the title 'Mes petits papiers: Souvenirs d'un journaliste, 1860-1870' (Paris: Calmann Lévy; Boston: Schoenhof). In these he relates, with that gift for picturesque and dramatic narration which is so general among Parisian writers for the press, not only his own literary beginnings, but also those of many of the young journalists and avocats of twenty-five years ago, who have since become very important personages in the political world. Among the "jeunes gens d'avenir" whom we meet throughout M. Pessard's 'Souvenirs' are Jules Ferry, Charles Floquet, now President of the Chamber of Deputies; Adrien Hébrard, now Senator and directeur of the Temps; Clément Duvernois, in its later years one of the ministers of the Empire which he began by opposing, and who, in the various aspects and fortunes under which his friend presents him, suggests some hero imagined by a writer of romance, a kind of Beaumarchais of the nineteenth century. There are, too, several picturesque glimpses of Gambetta in the early days, when he was still an unknown young avocat.

—In 1866 M. Pessard became one of the collaborateurs of La Liberté, which Émile de Girardin had just purchased. From this time his petits papiers become even more instructive and entertaining than before. Besides the great journalist himself, both Émile Ollivier and the Emperor enter upon the scene and act the chief parts to the end, giving to the last half of the volume a special importance which might easily be overlooked at first in the enjoyment of M. Pessard's delightful and unfailing good humor and gayety. All the famous men of the Liberal or Republican Opposition under the Second Empire pass by in the pages of M. Pessard, and the political history of the period is related from the writer's point of view at the time, modified by his present opinions. The men are presented under novel conditions sometimes, and the events are related so as to show quite as novel possibilities of interpretation; but it all appears to be done with fairness, and even generosity. The worst accusation that has been brought against M. Pessard seems to be that his facts, correct in themselves, are often shown in a fantastic light. This is probably true, but then any light but one's own always appears fantastic to an opponent.

ADMIRAL BLAKE.

Admiral Blake. By David Hannay. [English Worthies. Edited by Andrew Lang.] D. Appleton & Co. 1886. 12mo, pp. 194.

No name stands with better right in the list of English worthies than that of Robert Blake; and perhaps no Englishman of equal greatness is less known in the present generation. That he was the soldier of Parliament and the Commonwealth has probably stood in the way of his fame in two ways—by subjecting his name to the same depreciation as that of Cromwell, until the change of sentiment in the present century; and, since then, by the exaggerated emphasis placed upon Cromwell personally and the civil history of England during this period. Mr. Hannay has, he says, found but scanty materials, and he has made but a thin book as compared with others of the same series. It is a book of unquestionable merit, and deserves to be widely read. We think, however, that he might have made it larger, even with his scanty materials, and that without undue diffuseness or padding. Blake's life, if not a very long one, was full of incident and adventure, and his biographer seems to us to have yielded so far to the demand of the day for "small books" as to omit matters that would be really interesting and valuable. To take one example: The famous attack on Santa Cruz de Teneriffe is related in less than three pages—very well related indeed, but the story is so condensed that (there being, moreover, no plan of the battle) it is not easy to understand all the movements of the fight, nor is the account so graphic and picturesque as it might easily have been made by more detail. As a personal life of Blake, and an estimate of the place which he holds in English history, the book deserves great praise.

The theatre of the war which broke out in 1652 between England and Holland, then at the height of her power, was what is known as the "Narrow Seas," the English Channel and the German Ocean. After a stormy winter voyage, on the 8th of February once, as the present writer came, weak with sea-sickness, upon deck, he found the sun warm and bright as May almost, driving before it the heavy fog. The sea at last was smooth; beyond it to the northward rose, dim, a fine bold line of shore, towards which the heart turned with a double longing. To a sea-tired man, it was the first land; to a son of the Anglo Saxon race, it was the old home. The cape was the Lizard, the southwest point of England, at the entrance to the English Channel. Soon the Lizard grew fainter as we steered eastward; the land receded on the left until the gazer almost felt that, Ixion-like, he had embraced a cloud. But, as the forenoon proceeded, the shore rose again, this time into Start Point, close by Plymouth. Once more there was a trend of the shore inward; once more in front, beyond the sea, now sail-dotted, rose a high, bold bluff, this time the Bill of Portland. Then, after the moon rose, it was St. Alban's Head, and at last the Needles, at the western end of the Isle of Wight. Thus, all day, we shot from cape to cape across the bays, with far-off glimpses into Cornwall, Devon, Dorset, and Hampshire. Even then upon the fields there was a tinge of spring green; once, over a hill, a rainbow hung in a cloud of vapor. The blue line inland was soft and undulating; the great capes rose bald and bleak, their storm-worn ledges beating back the surf like doubled knuckles. So the majestic brotherhood, the headlands of the channel, passed us on, one to another, until we were sheltered in the Solent. On deck betimes the next morning, it was revealed that we were just between Dover and Calais. Southeast the eye could make out distinctly a high, wavy coast-line—France. Nearer, to the north and west, was the white shore of Albion. The wind blew bitter cold out of the North Sea. One thought of Lear and Edgar, as the Shakspere Cliff looked through the air sharp as ingratitude. How fine the sequence of historic figures that, since gray antiquity, have seen rise, as we saw them rise, those beaked and windy promontories, for ever surf lapped! Of all events, however, of which the English Channel has been the scene, what ones more worthy to hold the thoughts of Americans than the struggles here of the Commonwealth? Popular liberty was the aim. Had those struggles failed, America as well as England might have bent to the sceptre of an autocrat instead of to the ballot of the freeman.

On February 18, 1653, the English Channel and its shores looking, we may suppose, as in the February view just described, a fleet of seventy sail lay off the Bill of Portland, pigmies, for the most part, no doubt, compared with our modern craft, though a few ships were of fair size, and the naval architecture of the time was such that even small ships were sometimes imposing. The Sovereign of the Seas, at this time the crack ship of the British navy, was of nearly 1,700 tons burden, elaborately painted and gilded. For sixty years she was a famous fighting ship, earning the sobriquet of "The Yellow Devil." That day, however, the Triumph, of sixty-eight guns, was the flagship, and in the lookout, high up the mast, hung Robert Blake himself, a man of fifty-three, short, thick-set, his broad face much bronzed by campaigning on land and sea. He was of the same station in life as Cromwell, of Oxford training, with a pedantic foible for quoting Latin, curious enough in an old sailor. He had risen to fame as a colonel of horse. When foreign foes were to be met he was sent to the fleet, though he was fifty years old and had scarcely ever been on shipboard. Strangely enough, such inexperience was regarded as but a slight objection. He had bestridden the war-horse to good purpose, therefore he could ride the waves well; the sequence in those days was thought logical, and seemed often to be thoroughly justified. Not only Blake, but many another fine trooper, on each side, Rupert, for instance, and Monk and Dean, were not less dashing and effective on the surf than on the turf. It is chronicled that these fine old horse-marines sometimes became confused in battle, roaring out to the sailors commands appropriate for cavalry; but it did no harm. With surprising power of adaptation, the champions of that time appear, with foot now in the stirrup, now on the shrouds, equally efficient with either brace.

That February day in 1653, things were critical for the Commonwealth. Van Tromp, the Dutch Admiral, had, in the previous fall, crushed the English fleet, and all winter had patrolled the Channel with a broom at his mast-head. The Council of State, under the lead of young Sir Henry Vane, as able to prepare as Blake was to execute, recalled all scattered ships, put on board by whole regiments the Ironsides of Dunbar and Worcester, and seized hemp, tar, timber, and powder wherever they could be found. Night and day the shipyards rattled. The list of captains was severely scrutinized, and wholesale cashiering and promoting done without fear or favor. Blake went aboard not alone. He had, as subordinates, the skilful seamen Penn, father of Sir William, and Lawson, who had fought his way up from before the mast. Dean, a stout major-general, was on the Triumph with Blake, and blackbrowed Monk, "Silent old George," Cromwell's right-hand in Scotland, and destined to a more questionable fame in years far ahead, as the engineer of the Restoration, went aboard ship with a great force of land troops at a day's notice.

What fast-sailing frigate it was, whether the Antelope, the Constant Warwick, or the Tenth Whelp, that first brought news of the approach of Van Tromp, we cannot say. It was made known, however, that he was on his way eastward from the Lizard with seventy-six ships of war and a convoy of three hundred merchantmen, craft from all parts of the world with rich cargoes, to be guarded through those dangerous narrow seas. Van Tromp himself is a bluff, picturesque figure. No suspicion of a horse-marine character attached itself to him. A sailor and the son of a sailor, he had seen his father killed in action by the English, and had been himself two years and a half a prisoner to the English, serving as a cabin-boy. He had brought the Spaniard to grief, had fought the English in battles drawn and battles gained, and now stood on his quarter deck, grizzly with fifty-six years of amphibious life, an old salt, almost web-footed.

Blake from his lookout saw the Dutch approaching, the innumerable sails white in a brilliant sunrise. Van Tromp had the wind, and bore swiftly down upon him with the men-of-war, while the merchantmen kept well aloof. Blake's own line was not yet formed, two of his squadrons beating slowly up to his help against the unfavorable breeze. He met with his few ships, however, the whole force of the Dutch, who came on well together. As Van Tromp's flagship, the Brederode, approached at eight o'clock, the Triumph lay first in her path, and received Van Tromp's broadside when within musket-shot. The Brederode tacked instantly, sending in another broadside close under the sails, with terrible splintering and carnage. But the Triumph gave gun for gun; in a few minutes the little English squadron was enveloped by enemies, and a cannonade roared over the sea that could be heard from Portland to Boulogne. When two hostile ships approached there would be ramming with prows, a grappling of hulls, then a cry on both sides for boarders. How pike and cutlass clashed in the port-holes; how the sailors climbed, clinging to every projecting bit of carving, running along boom and yard, leaping at a venture from one tossing deck to another among a crowd of enemies, the hot cannon meanwhile at rest, because, in the mêlée, friend was no less likely to suffer than foe—from the data of the old histories, one can fill out the picture. De Ruyter, then a young commander, boarded the Prosperous and drove her crew to surrender. He was driven off; he captured her again, and was driven off again, the shattered decks strewn four times with the awful wreck of the combat. Here was a ship on fire, there a ship went down with all on board, her wounded captain flourishing his hanger defiantly as she disappeared. On the Triumph more than a hundred of her crew, half her complement, were slain outright, and scarcely a man remained unhurt. Blake himself was sorely wounded in the thigh by a flying splinter, which same splinter, says the conscientious chronicler, "tore a large hole in the breeches of Admiral Dean." Amid the sea strewn with ruin, Blake's remaining ships at last came up, and the scale turned in his favor. It was necessary, however, to tow the Speaker, Penn's ship, out of the line, utterly helpless; others crept through the Solent to Portsmouth, scarcely able to make sail, while still others barely floated. The Dutch, however, had lost eight ships—riddled and gore-stained trophies! One, when visited, was found to have no living soul on board. Such was the battle of the first day.

As dusk fell, Van Tromp withdrew, protecting his merchantmen, which, while the men-of-war grappled, had diligently crowded sail and were now well eastward towards home. The breeze fell at night, and the fleets drifted slowly past the Isle of Wight, the unsleeping crews making ready for new conflict. The battered Triumph, with the wounded Blake, managed in some way to keep with the rest, destined to play a further part in what Clarendon calls "this very stupendous action." The 19th there seems to have been no engagement; but on the morning of the 20th a light breeze gave the fleets the opportunity anew. Van Tromp changed his tactics. Spreading his men-of-war in a wide crescent, like the protecting wings of a mother-bird, he gathered the merchantmen within the hollow and sped up the Channel. The heavy-laden craft made slow way. At noon the astonishing Triumph, under jury-masts, we may suppose, was upon the Dutch rear, within gun-shot, and soon after the bow-chasers of the remaining English ships were in full play. The signals flew from the Brederode to the traders: they were to make their best speed, hugging close the French coast by Calais and Dunkirk. Tromp himself with the fighting ships tacked about with the finest courage against the concentrated and now overpowering foe. De Ruyter was in especial danger; Lawson in the Fairfax was especially brave. The English began to have the upper hand, but Van Tromp fell back towards his convoy, "contesting every wave." Faction was rife on the Dutch decks, and when night came at last, clear and cold, what with treachery within and such foes without, the redoubtable Hollander was glad of a respite.

"Still," as Penn said afterwards, remembering those three days, "a Dutchman is never so dangerous as when he is desperate." On Sunday morning, the 21st, the mother-bird was seen as before with her chickens folded by her wings, but now sadly plucked and lamed. For a third time there was the fiercest grappling, this day where the strait is narrowest. How, as the cannon boomed off Dover, the people must have flocked to the cliffs, peering at the distant battle through the wintry air! Penn at last broke through Van Tromp's encircling guard and captured fifty merchantmen. The battered Triumph, with Blake on the quarter-deck, in spite of his wound, dashed on after the main body, crashing against craft which, reckless of themselves, tried to block his path. His fleet streamed after him, the cannon never silent, while the crippled masts cracked under the press of canvas. More than half the Dutch men-of-war became prizes, and Blake thought he had grasped the entire fleet. But as pursuers and pursued swept out into the North Sea, a night of storm set in. When morning dawned, Van Tromp had vanished as if he were the Flying Dutchman himself. In their flat-bottomed craft, made for shallow seas, knowing now every inlet and current of the home waters, his ships had fled over and through the dangerous bars, close in shore, where the English dared not follow. The clutch of Blake had been eluded after all. The greater part of the convoy flocked past the Texel towards Amsterdam, bark and cargo safe; while the fighting craft, diminished but defiant, backed now by dangerous shore batteries, offered to the foe their still unconquered broadsides.

Already, it must be remembered, the war had raged for nine months, when Blake and Van Tromp sighted one another off Portland Bill; nor did the indecisive action which has just been described end it. Van Tromp was in the Downs again early in June, with one hundred ships, this time unencumbered by a convoy. Blake's wound kept him inactive, but Lawson broke the Dutch line after the fashion of Rodney against De Grasse, and Nelson at Trafalgar. Poor Dean, the hero of the torn breeches, that day was cut in two by a chain-shot, and Monk showed himself a capital commander. The Brederode herself was boarded and on the brink of capture. At the critical moment a match was thrown, it is said by Van Tromp himself, into the magazine. The decks roared into the air with all the English intruders and a great part of the Dutch defenders. Van Tromp, it was supposed, was lost; but coming either out of the air, or the sea, or from some fragment of the ship that had escaped destruction, he was seen, invulnerable as a phantom, on the deck of a fresh, fast-sailing frigate, careering along his shattered and yielding line, trying to rally them to a new encounter. The day, however, clearly went against him; nor was fortune kinder in July. In a conflict fiercer than ever, a musket-ball stretched Van Tromp dead upon his post, and the cause of Holland was lost. That day alone 5,000 men were slain, and in the whole war the Dutch admitted a loss of 1,100 ships.

After the contest with the magnificent Dutch, to encounter other Powers was for the Commonwealth mere child's play, though Blake fought that remarkable battle with a Spanish fleet under the Peak of Teneriffe. Referring the reader to Mr. Hannay's book, we can only mention that Blake's heroic period was comprised within six years. When he was fifty-six years old, decrepit through wounds, worn out with weary tossing, winter and summer, upon desolate seas, he yearned for his native Somersetshire, and with the early summer of 1656 his battered flag-ship, the George, crossing the Bay of Biscay, saw before her at length the loom of the Lizard. Home was at hand, but the Admiral was dying. The ship spread all her canvas, that at least he might die ashore. Her progress, however, was slow, crippled as she was, like the commander, by much service; and off the Start, two hours before they could cast anchor in Plymouth Roads, his spirit fled. Heroic Ironside that he was, he prayed as he fought, whether in the saddle or on the deck, and his rugged followers lifted up their voices in company. Nor was he without fine and gentle traits. He loved his old neighbors and his home, and, like Hampden, Sidney, and Vane, while combatant in the fiercest conflicts, had the graces of a scholar and a gentleman.

PRICE'S LONDON GUILDHALL.—I.

A Descriptive Account of the Guildhall of the City of London: its History and Associations. Compiled from Original Documents, with Facsimile Charters, Maps, and other Illustrations, by John Edward Price. Prepared by authority of the Corporation of the City of London under the Superintendence of the Library Committee. Pp. iii, 298. London. 1886.

ANY one who has seen the Report of the Library Committee, delivered to the Common Council of the City of London on Thursday, December 16, 1886, and who has read Mr. Price's Preface, will turn with the highest expectations to the body of the work.

"A mere architectural description of the building," says the author, "could have been dismissed in a few pages. . . . The true history of the Guildhall is rather to be traced in the numerous traditions and interesting associations by which it is connected with the most important corporation in the world. . . . Associated it has been in one way or another with almost every occurrence of importance belonging to the history of this country, whether such be related to royalty, politics, law, commerce, or public ceremonial. . . . The edifice is one which with the citizens of London must ever command an interest unsurpassed by any other of their public buildings" (pp. ii, 3-4).

The present work originated in the desire of the Corporation to preserve plans and drawings of such portions of the Guildhall as were to be removed for the erection of the new Council Chamber. According to the Report of the Library Committee, it cost £1,596 8s., and three years were devoted to its compilation, a delay of two months being caused by the fire at the printing-house of Messrs. Blades, East & Blades. Mr. Price begins with a consideration of "the origin and development of that municipal life which has made the city what it is" (pp. 4-32); he then traces the architectural history of the Guildhall as a whole (pp. 33-63) and that of its particular parts—the Kitchen, Hall, Crypts, Library, Blackwell Hall, the Aldermen's Court, Council Chamber, and the Offices, including a description of their contents (pp. 63-185), and a brief account of the development of the Mayoralty, the Court of Aldermen, the Common Council, and the offices of Chamberlain, Comptroller, and Town Clerk (pp. 156-185). Then follows a discussion of the subjoined topics: receptions, Lord Mayor's show, trials, the great fire of 1666, lotteries, the Orphans' Court, the new Library, the Museum, and the excavations for the new Council Chamber (pp. 185-256). The work concludes with an Appendix of original documents (pp. 257-266) and an Index (pp. 267-298). The volume contains 7 maps, 38 chromo-lithographs, and 112 woodcuts, most of which are admirably executed.

The portions of the work dealing with the history of the City of London are of most interest to the general public, but are least worthy of commendation. The attempt, on pages 3-9 and elsewhere, to glorify the Corporation of the City of London by showing its Roman origin is far from successful. The crude analogies traced between its civic functionaries and those of the Roman "municipia" are just as applicable to all civilized nations in all ages—to New York, for example, as well as to London. The fact that some French towns are of Roman derivation, which the author emphasizes as corroborative testimony, proves nothing at all as regards English towns. On page 7 we are asked to accept as further evidence a passage from the mawkish chronicler, Jocelin de Brakelond, namely, the allegation of the Londoners that they had been free of toll everywhere in England from the time of the foundation of Rome, with which that of London was contemporary—"a tempore quo Roma primo fundata fuit, et civitatem Lundonie eodem tempore fundatam." This evidence is about as reliable as the old inscription on the tablet at Winchester, to the effect that the latter city was built by Ludor Rouse Hudibras, 892 B. C., or as the assertion of the chronicler Fitzstephen ('Vita Sancti Thomæ,' Prologus) that London is much older than Rome—"Urbe Roma, secundum chronicorum fidem, satis antiquior est." Here is some more of the author's profound reasoning on the same subject (p. 14): "They (the London wards) were local divisions, resembling the curiales and regiones of a classic city. On this there is the emphatic testimony of Fitzstephen, who, after his reference to the use of laws and institutions common to Rome, remarks, 'London is in like manner to Rome distributed into regions.'" The wards of New York resemble the regiones of Rome about as much as those of London did in the twelfth century, when Fitzstephen wrote his panegyric. The argument in favor of the Roman origin of English towns, so plausibly advanced by Wright and Coote, is impotent and, at times, almost ridiculous in the hands of Mr. Price, who does not in the least shake Loftie's conclusion, that "not a single fact of any kind has yet been adduced that will go even a little way towards proving this romantic theory" ('Historic Towns—London,' p. 14).

In his discussion of English gilds (pp. 24-30) the author displays much irrelevant learning concerning the Roman "collegia opificum," "collegia dendrophorum," etc., but does not present the shadow of a proof in support of his assumption that the former emanated from the latter. Some of this space might have been more advantageously devoted to an inquiry into the history and functions of the "cnihtengild," or gild of knights, which Mr. Price does not even mention in this connection, although some eminent authorities regard it as the quondam governing body of London, from which the Guildhall derived its name. The author next enters into a consideration of the gild merchant, which he would have discussed more intelligently had he been acquainted with the results of recent investigation. If, as he maintains, there really was such a general or dominant gild merchant of London in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, we should certainly meet with some trace of it in the 'Liber Custumarum,' the 'Letter Books,' and other muniments of London. The author's "internal evidence" in support of his position is the fact that the burgesses of Oxford, who had a gild merchant, received a charter from Henry III. granting them all the liberties of London. But it does not necessarily follow that London had every institution of Oxford. A town receiving such a charter was not completely remodelled after its exemplar, but simply grafted upon its own individual polity such of its prototype's liberties as it deemed advisable. The subject is fully investigated in the Antiquary, vol. xi, pp. 142-147, 199-203. Norton's statement ('Commentaries,' 3d ed., p. 25) that there is no trace of London ever having had a general mercantile gild, is certainly correct. The historical account of the various elements of the Corporation—namely, the Mayor, Court of Aldermen, Common Council, Chamberlain, Comptroller, and Town Clerk (pp. 156–185)—is meagre, fragmentary, and inaccurate. Some of these inaccuracies will be pointed out hereafter. Such important topics as the history of the Sheriffs and the growth of the Livery Companies are passed over in silence. A far better account of the constitutional development of the City could easily be compiled from the works of Loftie and Norton.

The author devotes several pages to the determination of the ancient site of the Guildhall (pp. 34–38). Though some of his evidence is of a dubious character, he is probably correct in concluding that the building formerly stood in Aldermanbury, not far from the west end of the present edifice. On pages 44–48 early references to the Guildhall are considered. The earliest given are circa 1212 and 1252. In this connection Mr. Price should not have failed to emphasize a passage in the 'Vita Galfridi' of Giraldus Cambrensis (Lib. ii, cap. 8). The latter, in describing the deposition of William Longchamp in 1191, thus pregnantly alludes to the Guildhall: "Convocata vero civium multitudine in aula publica, quæ a potorum conventu nomen accepit." Again, in the 'Liber de antiquis legibus,' under the year 1244, there is a passage which mentions the Guildhall ("convenientibus Civibus apud Gildhall," etc.), and at the same time elucidates the constitutional history of London. We feel confident that if Mr. Price had searched the records of the city and the old chroniclers more assiduously, he would have found other earlier and more valuable passages than those which he has printed. The year 1410 marks an important epoch in the history of the Guildhall. "In this yere also," says Fabyan, "was ye Guylde halle of London begon to be newe edyfied, and of an olde and lytell cotage, made into a fayre and goodly house as it nowe apperyth." On page 51 Mr. Price gives an English abstract of a valuable document bearing on the subject. The same record is printed more fully in Riley's 'Memorials of London,' pp. 589–591. Mr. Price might well have given us the Latin in extenso; it would be far more pertinent than most of the Latin originals printed in his book. This document, which belongs to the year 1413, is evidently the earliest reference to the subject that the author could find in the city archives. Here, too, we entertain strong doubts as to the completeness of his quest.

Throughout the whole work poor judgment is exhibited in the selection and coördination of materials, more space being frequently devoted to accessories than to essentials; some important topics seem to be utilized merely as pegs on which to hang genealogies and other matters either wholly irrelevant or remotely connected with the subject of discussion. On pages 30, 31, for example, we find a long Latin document relating to Oxford which has no connection at all with the point at issue. Pages 39–42, together with a full-page facsimile, belong to the same category. The fact that the greater part of the Guildhall stands in the Parish of St. Laurence, here occasions the author to give a long Latin grant of the Church of St. Laurence made by the Abbot of St. Sauve de Montreuil (pp. 40, 41); this leads him into several incoherent references to the monastery of St. Sauve. Continuing to dilate upon the Parish of St. Laurence, he prints an abstract of a document which only incidentally mentions the Guildhall in 1273 (pp. 42, 43), far more space being occupied with allusions to the witnesses than with the body of the record. On pages 45, 46, where early references to the Guildhall are considered, two-thirds of the matter consists of rambling excursions. The comparison of the size of the main hall with "other buildings ancient and modern" (pp. 76, 77), and the verbose inscriptions from the monuments in the building (pp. 81–84) might also have been omitted. One of these long inscriptions, containing some 250 words, is printed on page 81, though very legible on a plate facing that page. Pages 49, 115–117, 131, 161, 181, 202, 203, are in great part made up of genealogical digressions concerning persons casually referred to in the text. Of dubious relevancy is the amount of space assigned to Gog and Magog (pp. 89–95), the Lord Mayor's Show (pp. 196–205), and a description of the objects in the Museum (pp. 234–256). On the other hand, in some places we feel the need of more fulness. Some examples of this have already been given. The record on page 164 concerning the election of Aldermen is important, and should have been printed in extenso. On pages 168–170 there is a list of what Mr. Price calls the "first recognized Court of Common Council" (A. D. 1247). Why has he not printed it just as it is in the original? And why has he not indicated that the list has already been given to the world by Riley ('Memorials,' pp. liii–lv), with whose version Price's coincides verbatim? Doubtless, too, the city archives contain earlier lists still more worthy of publication. A list of circa 1320, with which the author is evidently unacquainted, may be seen in the British Museum—Lansdowne MSS. 558, fol. 204.

Another criticism, equally general, is this, that the author is very negligent in indicating the sources of his information. On page 46 we find the substance of a document which he prides himself on printing for the first time, but he furnishes us no clue to the repository of the original. The same is true of the record containing his "earliest reference" to the Guildhall (p. 44). Pages 52 and 140 are marred by similar omissions. He sometimes cites works without denoting the volume and page (see p. 5, note 1; p. 65, note 2; p. 134, note 1); or without giving the edition (for example, Stow, on pp. 21, 54, 121). Here are some examples of his heedlessness in this direction: "Kemble, Cod. Dip. p. 304" (there are six volumes); "Tacit. 15, Annal."; "Antiquarian Magazine, March, pp. 116 and seq." (pp. 45, 217, 224). The following references are wrong: p. 11, note 1; p. 12, note 3; p. 15, note 2; p. 21, note 1; p. 28, note 1; p. 220, note 2; p. 221, note 1. Doubtless a careful examination of those relating to the 'Letter Books' and other muniments of the City of London would yield a rich harvest of blunders.

SCHERER'S ESSAYS ON GOETHE.

Aufsätze über Goethe. Von Wilhelm Scherer. Berlin: Weidmann. 1886.

THE pervading quality of these essays is well indicated by the first title, "Goethe Philology." Scherer himself had the training of a philologist in the now current sense of the word. With one exception, his most important work was a brilliant contribution to the history of the German language. In his earlier years he was known as a promising Germanist, and such he continued to be to the end, save that his patriotic interest turned more and more from the language to the literature of the fatherland. Being called to Strassburg after the reopening of the University in 1872, he soon began to interest himself as a philologist in the youth of Goethe. In this line of study he was by no means a pioneer. Other scholars, notably Düntzer, had long been engaged in it, but there was just at this time a general accès of interest in Goethe's text and in the historical interpretation of it. To study the works, and even the words, of the poet just as he wrote them; to take less counsel of general ratiocination and more of history and philology; above all, to study the works of the poet genetically, endeavoring to follow him, so far as possible, in every detail of the creative process—this was the essence of the doctrine which began to be extensively preached and practised some fifteen or twenty years ago.

Among the ablest and the most enthusiastic votaries of this doctrine was Scherer. The first fruits of his work in this field are to be seen in the little volume, 'Aus Goethe's Frühzeit,' which appeared in 1879. From that time to the date of his death Goethe seems to have been his favorite study. He contributed to the Jahrbuch and to various periodicals a long series of special studies, the most important of which are here published under the editorial supervision of Erich Schmidt, formerly Director of the Goethe Archives at Weimar and now Scherer's successor at the University of Berlin. The book deserves a warm welcome both for its subject's and for its author's sake. It opens many a new vista for the student of Goethe, and it is the work of a highly gifted and inspiring writer.

The first of the essays, already alluded to, is an interesting review, written in 1877, of recent Goethe literature. The second, entitled "Gretchen," is an attempt to get at the facts which underlay Goethe's account of his first love, the Frankfort Gretchen, through whom he was brought into such unpleasant proximity to the criminal courts of his native city. This story, as recounted in 'Dichtung und Wahrheit,' has by some been thought to be a pure invention, and Goethe himself seems on one occasion to have intimated that such was the case. But Scherer finds reason for thinking that the account has a strong basis of fact, and that—which is, however, by no means a new idea—the play "Die Mitschuldigen," with its atmosphere of rascality, was a direct precipitate of this early experience of human depravity. A third study, upon "Goethe as a Lawyer," endeavors to show, contrary to the opinion of a German jurist, that Goethe's briefs were quite different from those of other lawyers of his day. Following this we have a chapter on "Goethe as a Journalist." Concerning the reviews written by Goethe and Merck in 1772, Scherer says that he does not hesitate to rank them with the best that German criticism has produced; he even finds them "brighter, bolder, and less monotonous" than the Literaturbriefe of Lessing. A passage in this essay will, for two or three reasons, bear quoting:

"I oppose," says Scherer, "whenever I can the coarse doctrine that reviews are written for the day only, and have no further use than to tell the public in the briefest and clearest manner whether it ought to regard some new book as nice or as abominable. Especially have I no liking for reviews which are intended to annoy or to disparage people, or to vex some third person who has nothing to do with the affair. Even reviews may be works of art. Even reviews may reflect a human soul. Even reviews may essay to become a permanent and valuable possession of the national literature; if only they spring from a pure intent, are written in the service of truth and justice, and reveal the honest thoughts of their authors."

Essays follow upon various incomplete or unwritten works of Goethe—the "Nausikaa," of which we have an outline sketch by scenes, and about a hundred and fifty lines of more or less fragmentary text; the "Iphigenia in Delphi," of which we have nothing save some allusions in Goethe's letters; and the "Pandora," of which we have a large fragment, with a "scheme" for its continuation. Each of these studies is an attempt to describe in some detail the drama that would probably have resulted if Goethe had worked out his theme. Tastes will differ as to the value of such speculations upon what might have been; those who have a fancy for them will doubtless call these essays brilliant specimens of "divinatory criticism." Scherer's ardor does not appear to be at all dampened by the reflection that he is dealing, not with works which were interrupted by death (that would be quite another matter), but with poetical projects which stagnated simply because the projector lost interest in them.

Another favorite field of research and speculation with Scherer was the relation between Goethe's poetic creations and his multifarious affairs of the heart. Thus we have a long essay upon "Stella," in which an attempt is made to show us prototypes in real life for the chief characters and motifs of that curious drama. Scherer had a high opinion of the value of such studies, and bestows some rather caustic epithets upon those who are continually uttering their cautions about "going too far" in these matters. His contention is that it is quite impossible to go too far. Quoting Goethe's saying to the effect that his "works were always simply the recorded joys and sorrows of his life," Scherer argues that any one who would understand the works must study the life, must regard nothing as unimportant, and must not be too shy of resorting to surmises where proof is out of the question. This attitude of mind on the author's part is eminently characteristic of all the studies; and as one thinks of this general position, so will he be likely to think of a large part of the volume. For ourselves, while we commonly read Scherer with interest and with profit, yet we cannot always share his enthusiasm for his themes. It is doubtless true for philosophical purposes that all things hang together, and that nothing is quite isolated. It is likewise true that a life like that of Goethe will reward a more minute study than we should think proper to bestow upon a man of less importance. But, after all, life is short, and the student of literature has before him a wide and inexhaustible field, in which there are at least degrees of importance. When, therefore, one finds himself tempted to enter upon a serious and detailed study of the amatory experiences not only of Goethe himself, but of the whole amative crew with which he associated in that amative epoch, one may at least be excused for raising the question whether upon the whole it might not be better worth while to do something else. Our modest opinion is that the department of erotology has acquired in Goethe literature a somewhat factitious prominence. It is doubtless well enough to recognize the importance of the blind archer for the life of man in general, and not to lose sight of his quite exceptional importance for the life of Goethe in particular; but, really, it is quite another thing to follow up every casual shaft and scrutinize the wound with a microscope.

But the most interesting essays in the volume are those upon "Faust," and of these the most important is the one entitled "Betrachtungen über Faust," which is reprinted from the Goethe-Jahrbuch for 1885. Among the most difficult questions that the student of "Faust" has to deal with are those which recent criticism has raised concerning the unity and coherency of the work. That there are real difficulties along this line will probably be admitted by all save perhaps those for whom the interpretation of "Faust" is simply an exercise of the speculative imagination. Were all external testimony lacking, the poem itself contains abundant evidences of the fact that it was not the product of one sustained creative effort, but a mosaic which took a long time in the making, and is put together of heterogeneous pieces that are not always perfectly matched in form or color. Here we find a passage which seems to contradict what is said somewhere else; there the text appears to presuppose knowledge not contained in the poem or in the legends; again, a character will seem to forget his rôle and to say what he ought not to say. Difficulties of this sort, many of them doubtless imaginary, have given rise to two tolerably distinct classes of expounders—those who are disposed to press these incongruities, and to build theories upon them relative to Goethe's "changes of plan"; and those who seek rather to explain such matters into harmony with the general character and design of the poem, or at least to make them appear unimportant.

Scherer belonged to the former class of critics. His art consists in applying to "Faust" the same methods of study which modern philology has applied with such striking results to the Homeric poems, the Bible, and the Nibelungenlied. Such a procedure, plainly enough, is not to be taken as a matter of course. The Homeric poems, the Bible, and the Nibelungen songs came into existence long ago, amid literary conditions very different from those of modern times. Of their genesis we know but little from sources extraneous to the text. "Faust," on the other hand, is a thing of yesterday. We know who wrote it and, in much detail, how it was written. We know the sources from which the author drew, and can follow the whole history of his mind and art. Quite apart from the text, we know much about the genesis of the poem. All this might seem to necessitate from the critic of "Faust" a different art from that which he would apply to works of the other sort. But for Scherer these considerations are invested with no great significance. He goes on his way, let us not say ignoring, but paying upon the whole comparatively little attention to the consciously designing, choosing, rejecting, moulding personality of Goethe. A hiatus, a metrical accent, a rhythmical form, a peculiar turn of phrase, a fact of style—such matters are made by him the basis of important and far-reaching conclusions regarding the history of his author's poetic intentions.

In the essay above referred to, he examines the opening monologue of Faust from the beginning to where the Earth-spirit disappears. This portion of the text belonged to the "fragment" of 1790, and its coherency had not before been called in question. But Scherer, submitting it to his searching philological analysis, finds it full of inconsistencies; finds it to be, in fine, a patchwork of discordant elements, representing two or three different plans, and clumsily put together by Goethe, in the expectation that the world would never find out what he had done. We have not the space to reproduce or criticise Scherer's argument. Suffice it to say it is ingenious, subtle, and inconclusive. It seems to us a conspicuous illustration of the perils which may beset a purely philological treatment of literature.

A CRITICULE RAMPANT.

The Revisers' English. Series of Criticisms, showing the Revisers' Violations of the Laws of the Language. By G. Washington Moon. London: Hatchards. 1882.

Ecclesiastical English: A Series of Criticisms, showing the Old Testament Revisers' Violations of the Laws of the Language, Illustrated by more than 1,000 Quotations. By G. Washington Moon. London: Hatchards. 1886.

OCCASIONALLY there appears an intrinsically worthless book which, by reason of the interest attaching to its subject, or the fact that its author is earliest in the field to deal with it, calls for the recognition which, under ordinary circumstances, it would best be denied. Of this description are the two volumes now in hand. Summarily, what Mr. Moon is pleased to magnify as his "criticisms," besides the impossibility of their effecting any good, are, in large measure, calculated simply to mislead or to perplex. Consequential as are their pretensions, their actual plane is of the humblest. None but the most ignorant can require the style of lessons which they profess to afford; and such would do well to apply to a competent instructor, which Mr. Moon, beyond question, is not. Moreover, this self-satisfied and presumptuous caviller is evidently unvisited by any the least suspicion of his radical incapacity for the undertaking on which he has ventured.

Whatever the faults of language—almost wholly retentions from the authorized version of the Scriptures—on which Mr. Moon descants, and for which he hoots and reviles the retainers, there is, assuredly, not one of those scholars from whom, writing independently, we should expect English anything near so incondite as his own. His mother tongue, as he practises it, is, indeed, every here and there, in spite of his laying claim to an "excessive [sic] love of the beautiful," a peculiar jargon. For example, he writes: "Bearing that in mind, the expression 'exalt thyself' [i. e., this expression, if it bears that in mind] is certainly to be preferred to 'mount on high.'" "In Luke viii, 42, it [what?] says that the daughter of Jairus was about 'twelve years of age.' . . . In the Authorized Version it [what?] is, 'she was of the age of twelve years'; and, undoubtedly, it is better to speak of a young girl as being [of] a certain 'age,' than to speak of her as being 'old.'" "Was Saul king more than once, that the Revisers must needs make this alteration? The Scriptures are silent respecting it" [i. e., "this alteration," it seems]. A column might easily be filled with instances of Mr. Moon's slovenliness and seamy grammar quite as flagrant as these.

Any one who is capable of such things should be very cautious how he passes judgment on the syntactic proficiency of others. Of diffidence, however, Mr. Moon does not give token of so much as a rudiment. In one place he pronounces, "It is idle to attack my criticisms"; and of this position, transparently, he is confident everywhere. Regarding the revisers of the New Testament, he says that "we have indubitable evidence that the majority are not good English scholars." And equally contemptuous is his tone with reference to the revisers of the Old Testament. Not only does he tax them with "childishness," but he asserts that they "treat with lofty disdain all rules of grammar." Again: "I give the Revisers credit for having endeavored to write correctly, but it was beyond them; they could not do it." "I can say only that I am sorry they are Englishmen." A dozen more similar samples of his swelling insolence might be produced; but we must restrict ourselves to quoting one, in which he reaches the climax of his effrontery: "I have not, in these criticisms, asked my readers to consider graces of style, and such like high matters; that were a hopeless task, with such writings as the Revisers' before us. It will be time enough to consider the higher branches of the language of the Sacred Scriptures when the Revisers have learnt to express themselves grammatically."

The stamp of Mr. Moon's philology, when excursive beyond points of syntax familiar to every schoolboy, may be seen from the musty dreamage which he retails concerning the origin of but, if, and though, or from his gross ignorance about naughty, oftentimes and shamefast. A smattering of Greek, though ever so slight, would, further, have kept him from laying it down that, in Matt. x, 4, the translation ought to run, "and Judas Iscariot also, who betrayed him." Worse than this, however, are his offers to recompose the Old Testament, where it does not harmonize with his bald fancy. A single specimen of his handiwork to that end will amply suffice:

"What do the Revisers mean us to understand when they say, in Psa. xcv., 7, 'We are the people of his pasture, and the sheep of his hand'? 'People' do not 'pasture,' nor are 'sheep' led by the 'hand.' Doubtless what the Psalmist meant was, 'We are the sheep of his pasture'; (which agrees with Psa. c., 3, 'We are . . . the sheep of his pasture'); and 'We are the people of his hand'; (which agrees with Jer. xxxi., 32, 'I took them by the hand, to bring them out of the land of Egypt')."

Usage in speech, however venerable its establishment, is nothing to Mr. Moon, when it happens to run counter to his starveling conceptions of propriety and prettiness. In fact, his books under notice would dwindle to the skimpiest of pamphlets if, other sources of surplusage counted in, he were not constantly at war with phrases and senses of phrases which very few save himself find exceptionable. "All of you," "agree together," "assembled together," "both of them," "despite of," "each of them," "for ever and ever," "had rather speak," "one half," "he spake plain," "rise up," "vanish away," "widow woman," are among the numerous expressions which he cashiers as unbearable. Owing to simple oversight, one may presume, his criticastry takes no stigmatic note of "was being done away," the reviser's variant reading of "was passing away," in II. Cor. iii., 7. Such archaisms as "after" for "according to," "except" for "unless," "thine often infirmities," and "tell" for "count," it might be anticipated that he would not endure. "Eating no bread" he despises, as being "colloquial"; and he speaks, uncouthly, of its "inelegancy," matching which are his "arrogancy" and "emphaticness." "Mine hand" is to him "asinine." Travelling out of his record, he also captiously condemns the perfectly legitimate locutions, "the name of Ellicott," "three alternatives," "to expend labor," and "under no circumstances."

It is not to be gainsaid that the revisers were by no means careful enough touching the English which they sanctioned as eligible for reproduction. Every item of the infirm grammar and manifold rhetorical defects which they copy from King James's divines is registered by Mr. Moon, and commented on, but quite superfluously, seeing that his assistance in substituting right for wrong is needed by none but the most illiterate, to whom, as to others, the Scriptures are not a pedagogue's manual to teach parsing. Thus, however, his books have been rendered sizable, while his flatulent and insipid jocosity has added still further to swell their bulk. Some notion of how he comports himself in his would-be facetious moods, and how in his not unfrequently satirical, may be gathered from what follows:

"We read, in Gen. vi, 16, of there having been 'stories' in the ark; a spelling which might, to some minds, suggest the idea that Noah and his family had provided themselves with a little light literature for rainy days." "While speaking of the proper spelling of words, let me ask the Revisers why they have made two distinct words of the compound word 'stronghold,' and said, in Zech. ix, 3, 'Tyre did build herself a strong hold' [i. e., though Mr. Moon appears not to know it, 'fortress,' 'keep']. . . . Would the Revisers write 'a theist' for 'atheist'?" "In II. Kings, iii, 16, we read, 'Then came there two women, that were harlots, unto the King, and stood before him.' Do the Revisers mean that, in Solomon's days, there were women who held the appointment of 'harlots unto the King'? It cannot be!" "Can any one tell me why the Revisers have described Esau as 'a hairy man,' and Elijah as 'an hairy man'? Was it because it was considered that, in Elijah's case, the 'h' should be dropped, "airy' being a more appropriate description of him who 'went up by a whirlwind into heaven'? II. Kings, ii, 11. For my own part I consider such jokes as quite out of place in the Bible. Let us, then, leave this specimen of lack-wisdom clerical levity (no pun intended), and resume our criticisms." "'Then David the King stood up upon his feet.'—I. Chron., xxviii, 2. Did the Revisers imagine that we should think he stood upon his head!" "Why do the Revisers speak of a 'widow woman'? Do they think it likely that any one would imagine that the 'widow' was a man?" "Why do the Revisers speak of a woman's 'latter end'? e. g., 'Her flittiness was in her skirts; she remembered not her latter end.' Lam., i, 9." "Fortunately, they have put a comma after the word 'old,' in Isa., lxiii, 11, or the reading would have been rather irreverent: 'Then he remembered the days of old, Moses and his people.'"

With kindred effusions of sickening silliness and blatant buffoonery the author takes up no fewer than a score or more of pages. And, after all, very probably, he has not been exhibited here at his worst. But the reader must, by this time, have had a surfeit of folly. That any useful purpose can be served by Mr. Moon's so-called "criticisms" is inconceivable. He has learned, or half-learned, something of English grammar, chiefly as propounded by hidebound dogmatists or ignoramuses; and his wearisome expense of words to make out that this or that squares with its rules, or contravenes them, suggests either that he regards those rules as profound mysteries, or that he looks upon his prospective pupils as likely to be the most obtuse of dullards.

In connection with the New Testament as newly revised, we take this opportunity of strongly recommending the 'Complete Concordance' to it, by Mr. John Alexander Thoms. Compiled with laudable care and, as concerns its typography, all that could be desired, it should be in the hands of every one that possesses the work to whose phraseology it is an indispensable key. The Messrs. Scribner are its American publishers.

Recollections of My Mother. By Susan I. Lesley. Boston: W. B. Clarke & Carruth.

READERS of the 'Letters of Chauncey Wright' may recall Prof. Thayer's portrait, in four lines, of "an admirable woman in Northampton who was a strong power in the community, who took, indeed, within the little limits of the town, all human affairs for her province." Already these filial 'Recollections' of Anne Jean Lyman had been printed for private circulation, but only last winter were they made accessible to a somewhat larger public. We then briefly commended the work as a remarkable exhibition of family life in Massachusetts, at a date (following the first decade of the century) when the New England towns, whether of the interior or the seaboard, possessed a culture, and a dignity, and a homogeneousness of population now to be sought in vain. It is, however, not simply as beautiful examples of the "old school" that Judge Joseph Lyman and his wife (a Robbins, by birth, and a lineal descendant of Anne Hutchinson) have a just claim on the public attention. His office and social station, and her Eastern connections, and their joint overflowing and incessant hospitality, drew to their home or into the current of their existence many eminent political, legal, and literary personages, and numerous lights of the Unitarian denomination. Webster and Lemuel Shaw, Bryant and George Bancroft, Harriet Martineau, Channing and Emerson, John S. Dwight and Rufus Ellis, David L. and Lydia Maria Child, the Sedgwicks, the Ellerys, the Cabots, the Robbinses, the Forbeses, the Wares, the Pickards, the Howes, the Flints, the Reveres—all these belonged to the Lyman circle as transient guests, visitors, relatives, or close friends. An intellectual welcome was at the same time extended to the best productions of the day, with the North American Review for a guide; and Mrs. Lyman's letters show the constant family habit of reading books, of judging them, of making extracts for future use.

Mrs. Lyman's personal traits of physical strength and a presence of almost aristocratic distinction, joined to true democratic feeling and the largest compassion and practical charity; her domestic assiduity; her energetic impulsiveness; her quick temper; her somewhat defective sense of humor, yet forcible and often droll expression—as when she writes, "I cannot compare my life this summer to anything but living on the top of a high tree, in a great gale of wind, in which all one's efforts are bent to holding on"—make a very engaging character, whose individuality borders here and there, to be sure, on eccentricity. Mrs. Lesley's delineation is delicate and at the same time faithful, and we are not spared the deepening gloom of her mother's old age, afflicted by the death of husband and child and kindred, and ending finally in the loss of her own faculties. Death had no more place in Mrs. Lyman's philosophy than it had in that of most of her generation. Her bereavements drew from Mr. Emerson letters of condolence here printed which are unsurpassable in diction.

While things spiritual and intellectual were ever dear to Mrs. Lyman, and she was full of good works, the conception of general reform was not familiar to her. Her daughter points out her want of sympathy with abolitionism, though she was an intimate friend of Eliza Lee Cabot (afterwards the wife of Charles Follen), and enjoyed the society of Mrs. Child. The author of the 'Appeal in favor of that class of Americans called Africans' offers a very instructive contrast to Mrs. Lyman, from whom she had nothing to learn in kindness of heart and good Samaritanism, while her sympathies had a broader range, and her superior literary gifts enabled her to be a national benefactor. The 'Recollections' can profitably be read in connection with the 'Letters of Lydia Maria Child'; and whereas the one will do much to inspire high ideals of the family relation, the other will take the mind abroad into that world-wide field of human responsibility and duty over the entrance to which we read, "Who is my neighbor?" Both works are fitted to benefit thoughtful girls, and both have an historical as well as moral value for young and old.

The Egyptian Campaigns, 1882 to 1885, and the events which led to them. By Charles Royle, Barrister-at-Law. 2 vols. London: Hurst & Blackett.

GREAT BRITAIN is, at this moment, engaged in an experiment without precedent in the history of mankind—the government, namely, of a world-wide empire by means of popular institutions; and it is to this fact that the want of any firm and consistent policy in Egypt is primarily due. The Liberal party came into office in 1880 pledged as deeply as men could be to an unaggressive policy abroad. They had, after a very fierce and bitter campaign, turned out their opponents on the express ground that their policy was one of incessant aggression and unjust assaults upon the rights of weaker races. Then came up this Egyptian question. The demand which Arabi and his party put forward was that the Chamber of Notables should be allowed to supervise that portion of the Egyptian Budget which did not refer to the public debt—a demand, from the point of view of an English Liberal, as legitimate as could be made. The Tories, however, adopting the precedent set by Mr. Gladstone in his Midlothian campaign, took the stump, and "the honor of the flag," "British prestige," "the highway to India," became as good words to conjure with as "the rights of the inferior races," "peace, retrenchment, and reform," or any other catch phrase. Mr. Gladstone's Egyptian policy was all along driven hither and thither by these contrary impulses. He and his colleagues were obliged to consider, not what was best to be done in Egypt, but the action which would secure them a majority in the House of Commons. They fought bloody and useless campaigns at one time to conciliate the Jingos; they minimized intervention at another in order to soothe the outraged feelings of the men of peace. And, as Mr. Royle frankly admits, if a Conservative Government had been in power, there is no reason to suppose that they would have acted with greater firmness or foresight.

What has recently happened in Egypt is merely a recurrence of what, under like conditions, happened in Afghanistan and in Zululand and, thirty-five years previously, in the Crimea. As regards Egypt, there was no Englishman acquainted with the subject but knew that it was impossible to intervene in Egypt without being forced to intervene in the Sudan. But the number of such Englishmen might be counted on the fingers of a single hand. To the nation generally it was a question of putting down a "military adventurer"; after which everything would go on as quietly as before. Another fallacy which is largely responsible for the Egyptian muddle, is the belief, deep-rooted in the British mind, that the abuses prevalent in an Oriental administration may be rectified by the simple device of placing foreigners with large salaries, and wholly ignorant of the language and the people, at the head of the several departments. This fallacy has never been eradicated. It is in full operation at this moment in Egypt. The Dual Control honestly believed that it had greatly bettered the conduct of the administration and the condition of the people. British experience, since the intervention, has shown that this belief was altogether an illusion. All that the Dual Control effected by preferring foreigners to all the most lucrative posts in the administration was to call into existence a national party to protest against the usurpation. The English, unwarned by the experience of the past, are again filling Egypt with British officials.

In conclusion it is only fair to say that Mr. Royle's book is an account of the "Egyptian campaigns," and only subordinately of the "events which led to them." Of these campaigns, the chief objection to his narrative is its over-minuteness. He records the incidents from hour to hour, which, in the case of such trifling affairs as the skirmish at Kassasin or the capture of the Egyptian position at Tell el Kebir, becomes a heavy tax upon a reader's power of endurance. In regard to the bombardment of Alexandria, he relates an incident which is new to us. On the morning after the bombardment it appeared at one time as if the forts were still determined to hold out, and the order was given for the fleet to recruit their stock of ammunition from the storeship:

"In this matter a most unexpected difficulty arose. Through some unpardonable blunder the ship had been despatched from Malta without a single filled common shell on board, and actually without powder to fill the empty shells she had brought with her, and most of which were of an obsolete pattern and unserviceable. Further than this, she had brought no fuses; and as the vessels of war had no reserves of powder, they would, had hostilities been resumed, have been speedily reduced to a state of comparative impotence."

Familiar Studies of Men and Books. By Robert Louis Stevenson. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. 1887.

MR. STEVENSON has done his best to forestall criticism by reviewing these essays seriatim in the preface. He is sensible of defects and humble in acknowledgment; but in his own case almost any man is an indifferent judge. His subjects are Victor Hugo, Burns, Walt Whitman, Thoreau, Yoshida-Torajiro, Villon, Charles of Orleans, Pepys, and Knox. He confines himself to some single point of view or a few aspects of these notables; often the mass of his paper is nothing more than a succinct statement of biographical or historical fact, with such general reflections and particular criticisms as one would expect from a thoughtful and wide-ranging reader.

At the best he does not rise above the region of personal impressions. He is beset with a certain smartness, the sin of the magazine writer. He says of Thoreau—"A more bald-headed picture of life, if I may so express myself, has seldom been presented." The phrase arrests the reader, but it is a vulgarism without the excuse of having a meaning. Such "catches" are not infrequent, and, together with some colloquial Anglicisms, they give a smack to the book, but do not improve it. Of Walt Whitman Mr. Stevenson writes jauntily, but with the proper apology in the preface that he meant thereby only to do better service for that poet, of whom he is an admirer—a discreet one, as he takes pains to intimate. His criticism on Whitman may be illustrated by this half-sentence, in which he commends a phrase——"what he himself has called, with unexcelled imaginative justice of language, 'the huge and thoughtful night.'" This is the sort of talk about Whitman which is incomprehensible on this side the water. The phrase which we have italicized is itself a curious one, though intelligible enough, but not so curious as the criticism it conveys. To put a test, if one were told that "the huge and thoughtful night" was from "Hamlet," would he naturally think it was spoken by the Prince or by the Players? This is a small matter, however, and the essay on Whitman is particularly weak, being pitched in a tone between scoffing and worshipping which it is especially difficult to use with entire sincerity. Mr. Stevenson usually finds a good deal to censure in all these worthies, and little to praise, except in the case of Yoshida-Torajiro, of whom he knows only what he was told, and in writing of whom he says he is merely a hand to hold the pen for his informant. There is a liveliness and intellectual substance in the papers which give them a superficial attraction beyond their intrinsic merit; but the fondness of the author for creating his character, his love of the picturesque, and the common temptations of an imaginative rather than a sympathetic writer, preclude him from criticism of the higher sort. As the familiar talk of a thoughtful man upon the books he happens to be interested in, this volume is agreeable; no higher claim can be made for it.

American Home Rule. A Sketch of the Political System in the United States. By Edmund Robertson, M.P., Barrister-at-Law. Edinburgh: Adam & Charles Black. 1887.

THE object of this book is to exhibit to British readers the general scheme of government in the United States. It therefore comprehends a discussion of "Congressional" government, of constitutional law, and of the State legislatures; but it makes no reference to the government of towns and cities. Although it is quite possible to treat of our constitutional system for certain purposes without considering these municipalities, yet, when the object is to instruct a people contemplating the introduction of "home rule," it seems a mistake to omit what is of the essence of our local self-government. The attitude of our people both towards Congress and towards the State legislatures is not comprehensible unless we take into account the all-important functions of the minor political bodies. It is because these bodies perform so completely the necessary work of government that the activity of the legislatures and of Congress is looked upon as superfluous.

Within the limits that the author has set himself, however, he has done his work with singular accuracy. He has the advantage of a legal training, and he has closely followed two very intelligent guides, Judge Cooley and Prof. Woodrow Wilson. It is hardly to be expected that a treatise by a foreigner intended for the instruction of foreigners should be of any particular value to Americans; but in this case Mr. Robertson has furnished us with a really excellent political text-book. We should hardly know where to turn for a clearer and neater account of our complicated system of government within an equal space. The facts, it is true, do not always correspond to the theory of our constitution; but it is impossible, in such a sketch as this, to do more than state the generally accepted theory, leaving the exceptions to suggest themselves or be disclosed by further study. We do not incline to the opinion that political systems can be transplanted, and it would be easy to point out reasons why methods available in the union of homogeneous communities are not available when the end to be attained is the disunion of heterogeneous communities. Mr. Robertson himself makes little attempt to suggest practical applications of our system to the solution of the Irish problem, and even leaves it uncertain what his own views are. His book is really all the better on this account, being equally available to all parties. We notice one rather ingenious comparison—that of the constitutional system prevailing in the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge with the Federal organization of the United States. Such a comparison cannot be pressed very far, but it may well be of service to the British mind in the process of admitting an unfamiliar idea.

From the Forecastle to the Cabin. By Captain S. Samuels. Harper & Brothers.

THIS little book is a striking illustration of the influence of environment upon literary workmanship in a receptive subject. Captain Samuels's mind has never been stiffened into grooves by the study of canons of expression, and his book is as fresh and as free as the ocean air that he has breathed from boyhood. During a long career at sea, in situations of danger and difficulty such as fall to the lot of few men, and fewer still have the nerve and courage to meet, he has faced duty squarely, resolutely, with unflinching purpose, and the recital of his doings is given with a straightforward modesty and a self-respect that make the reader put his faith implicitly in the man and in the narrative. There is no ostentation, no awkward self-consciousness. No doubt, Capt. Samuels is a born story-teller; at least he has discovered that the best way to tell a strong story is to let it tell itself, and the exceeding force and vividness of some of his bits of description are largely due to his moderation.

Bishop Potter, whose wide sympathies are extended to all seafaring men, from St. Paul to the Captain of the Dreadnought, introduces the book by a preface full of graceful and manly courtesy. We are rather disposed, however, to differ with the Bishop in his conclusion that the trials of sea life, as pictured in Captain Samuels's story, will act as a deterrent to boys or men who have an inclination in that direction. The spirit of adventure may not be so rife as it was formerly, but it must be a very cold-blooded lad indeed who does not follow with eagerness the veteran skipper as he is racing with Sir Edmund Lyons in the Archipelago, or rescuing the Swedish lady from the harem in Constantinople, or bailing out the life-boat after being washed overboard at the Cape, or quelling a mutiny of the "bloody forties" on board the Dreadnought. In the career of Capt. Samuels the truth yields nothing in its thrilling interest to the fictions of Marryat and Clark Russell.

It is no small service to the community to have passed through such a life, and to have met its incessant demands with such resolution and unyielding courage. It is in men of this type that the character of the American seaman has reached its highest development, and it is through the influence of such men that our seamen as a class have maintained a high standard of excellence. Therefore, notwithstanding the brutal and vicious phases of life with which they must come more or less in contact, we cannot but hope that seafaring pursuits will still attract good material among American youths, who will have the steadiness and pluck to overcome whatever of evil may assail them. As long as the merchant marine can produce men like Samuels, there is little danger that the old standard will be lowered.

Central America. Vol. III. [History of the Pacific States of North America. By Hubert Howe Bancroft. Vol. III.] 1801–1887. San Francisco: The History Company. 1887.

THE characteristics of Mr. Bancroft's historical series are now so well settled that it is needless to point them out in detail in each new volume of the rapidly lengthening list. The reviewer may come upon literary faults gross enough to make his flesh creep, but that is now one of the things he expects, and is scarcely worth mention. The vast heaps of unsmelted ore flung down at his feet may make the reader wish that they had been first carried to the reducing works; but it is much to get the ore, to be sure that it is all before him, that the mine has been thoroughly exploited, every vein followed up to its last filament.

The story of the struggles for Central American independence does not vary essentially from that of the working of the revolutionary ferment in all of the Spanish possessions of the new world during the first twenty years of the century, except, perhaps, in the failure to tell of some commanding personality—a Bolívar or Iturbide. The most striking dates and facts to be remembered in connection with the new measures enacted, independence once achieved and federation established, are the laws of December 31, 1823, and April 17 and 24, 1824, decreeing the emancipation of all slaves and the recovery of liberty by the slaves of other countries at the moment of touching Central American soil. "Of all the nations of North America, to the Central American republic belongs the honor of having first practically abolished slavery." The most readable part of the volume is the narrative of the revolution, of the brief Mexican affiliation, and of the final arrival at confederation. Here the material is skilfully handled, and there is some semblance of order and consecutiveness. Good-by must be said to all this, however, after chapter vi. Not that Mr. Bancroft does not get on as well as could be expected in the impossible task of trying to make a cosmos out of chaos. No one who remembers Stephens's amusing, if somewhat perilous, search, in 1840, after the Government to which he was accredited, and his justifiable elation at having at last "treed" it, will lightly accuse our historian of failure clearly to describe what never clearly existed. His mistake, if any, was in trying to describe in a single narrative five separate varieties of chaos. This was necessarily involved in his scheme, however, and the loose and broken threads of the great mass of this volume inevitably resulted. Some amends are made in the eight closing chapters, which are summaries of the highest value, under the heads "Central American Institutions," "The People" (two chapters), "Intellectual Advancement," "Judicial and Military," "Industrial Progress," "Commerce and Finance," and "Interoceanic Communication." The index to the three volumes of the series is not as full as it should be, to judge by a few instances of strange deficiency which we have noted.

American Society for Psychical Research.

The Research work of the Society is at present divided between five Committees:

1. The Committee on Thought-Transference is engaged in ascertaining whether a vivid impression or a distinct idea in one mind can be communicated to another without the intervening help of the recognized organs of sensation.

2. The Committee on Apparitions and Haunted Houses wishes to collect accounts, from trustworthy sources, of apparitions of absent or deceased persons, of premonitions, whether these occur in dreams or in the waking state, of disturbances in houses described as "haunted," and of any cognate phenomena.

3. The Committee on Hypnotism is engaged in the study of the mesmeric or hypnotic trance, with the object of ascertaining its causes and of elucidating its psychical and physiological accompaniments.

4. The Mediumistic Phenomena is chiefly concerned with the experimental investigation of the phenomena commonly described as "Spiritualistic," and is particularly desirous of obtaining opportunities for investigation with private and unpaid "mediums," or other persons in whose presence "mediumistic" phenomena occur.

5. The Committee on Experimental Psychology is making investigations in folk-thought or the study of sociology in its psychological aspects. It seeks to ascertain the psychical characteristics which many individuals may possess in common in virtue of their being members of particular races or communities.

Communications are earnestly requested from all persons interested in any branch of the work of the Society.

BOSWELL'S LIFE OF SAMUEL JOHNSON, LL.D.,

AND

JOURNAL OF A TOUR TO THE HEBRIDES.

INCLUDING

JOHNSON'S DIARY OF A JOURNEY INTO NORTH WALES.

Edited, with Notes, &c., by GEORGE BIRKBECK HILL, D.C.L.

6 Volumes, 8vo, $16

"This edition, for which the author of 'Dr. Johnson: His Friends and His Critics' has been collecting material for many years, embodies the results of the most recent research on the subject. The editor has been favored with the loan of many unpublished letters of JOHNSON, and has thus been able to clear up some obscure points in his history. He has likewise taken every opportunity of testing and verifying BOSWELL'S statements and references and those of former editors, and has spared no pains to render the OXFORD Edition of the Life fully worthy, in point of accuracy and the judicious selection of illustrative matter, of the author and his work.

"The Index is intended to be absolutely exhaustive, and will, it is hoped, serve as a key to that vast mass of literature and anecdote which has accumulated round the name of JOHNSON. The bibliographical apparatus is likewise peculiarly complete. The illustrations include an etching of the portrait of JOHNSON in the National Gallery, and reproductions of engravings of BOSWELL and JOHNSON, including the rare mezzotint of the latter in the Common Room of University College; of the Round Robin; and of several important letters of JOHNSON hitherto unpublished."

NOVELS FOR SUMMER READING.

THE CŒRULEANS. A Vacation Idyll. By H. S. Cunningham, author of 'Wheat and Tares,' etc. 12mo, $1.

"Good as was 'Wheat and Tares' twenty years ago, 'The Cœruleans' must be accounted even better. There was wit in that; in this there is a riper wit and abundance of wisdom as well. . . . We should have to quote the whole book, and it is simpler and more honest to tell our readers to read it."—Athenæum.

"A novel of uncommon merit. . . . It appeals to a high standard of taste and intelligence."—London Times.

JILL AND JACK. By E. A. Dillwyn, Author of 'Jill.' 12mo, $1.

"Nobody ought to complain that the author of 'Jill' has taken it into her head to write 'Jill and Jack.' . . . Miss Dillwyn has a certain liveliness and freedom from the usual routine of the novelist which make her books almost always worth reading."—Academy.

A New Story by the Author of 'Mr. Isaacs,' 'Dr. Claudius,' etc.

SARACINESCA. By F. Marion Crawford, author of 'Mr. Isaacs,' 'Dr. Claudius,' 'Zoroaster,' 'A Tale of a Lonely Parish,' etc. 12mo, $1.50.

In the multitude of crude workers is there at least one novelist whose power is so brilliant, so fascinating, as quite to suggest a vision of paradise in the happiness of reading his fiction, and this delight is touched at high-water mark in the late novel, 'Saracinesca.'—Boston Evening Traveller.

Delights and interests more than anything he has written since he surprised the world with 'Mr. Isaacs.' . . . He has in 'Saracinesca' written a powerful story of modern Roman life, which is better even than his 'Roman Singer.'—Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.

'Saracinesca' is a very remarkable book, and a great advance upon any of the author's previous work. . . . It would be difficult to conceive of a more gracious presence than that of the Duchess Corona. She is so pure and true, so brave under trial, and withal such a thorough woman—no angel, just a passionate, loving, lovable woman—faithful to her high ideal of right, loyal to her husband. . . . In any case, this is one of the most effective romances since 'John Inglesant.'—London Academy.

By the same author. Price, $1.50 each.
MR. ISAACS. DR. CLAUDIUS.
ZOROASTER. A TALE OF A LONELY PARISH.

MACMILLAN & CO., 112 Fourth Avenue, New York.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JUNE 23, 1887.

The Week.

THAT the idea of returning the rebel flags en masse was only the wrong way of doing the right thing, is strikingly illustrated by a letter which we find in the Philadelphia Press of Tuesday. The survivors of the "Philadelphia Brigade," consisting of four Pennsylvania regiments in the Union Army, have invited the survivors of Pickett's Division of Confederates to become their guests at Gettysburg on July 2, 3, and 4. During the great battle on that field twenty-four years ago, three Confederate flags were captured from Pickett's Division by members of one regiment of the Philadelphia Brigade. John W. Frazier, after conferring with leading members of the Regimental Association, says: "I believe I voice the sentiment of every member of Baker's historical regiment when I state, the climax of that reunion would be complete by the survivors of Col. Baker's old regiment returning in person to the brave men of Pickett's Division, upon this occasion of national interest, the three flags captured by them—the return to be made upon the spot where they were captured, and to be made at the time when the monument of the 71st is unveiled, July 3 next." On the presumption that official action looking in this direction will be taken at the meeting of the Regimental Association on June 25, he has therefore written the President to inquire what disposition has been made of these three flags, and to ask whether it is possible to return them to the Regimental Association. Whether it proves possible to comply with this request or not, the very fact that it is made is of the highest significance, as showing that there are plenty of Union soldiers who are ready to return rebel flags. Indeed, this has already been shown by such returns, notably in the return to a Mississippi regiment of their colors by the Ninth Connecticut Volunteers.

The "rebel flag" chorus winds up most appropriately with a speech from Gen. Benjamin Butler, late candidate of the People's Party and of the New York Sun for the office of President of the United States. A flag, according to the General, is an "archive," an evidence of victory. Returning captured flags is therefore a mutilation of public records, depriving our soldiers of their rightful place in history. He makes it very clear that if he had been elected instead of Mr. Cleveland, this thing would never have happened. Nevertheless, he deals very gently with the President. Strongly as he reprobates the mutilation of archives, he frankly acknowledges that the President did not know any better. The poor man had never had any experience that should teach him better. He insinuates strongly that since Mr. Cleveland never captured any rebel flags, he cannot be expected to understand their true value, and hence his giving them up is not a blameworthy act. Butler would of course have kept them, and especially all that he captured at Bermuda Hundred, Fort Fisher, and other places.

The approval by Gov. Ames of the bill passed by the Massachusetts Legislature exempting veterans from the conditions of the Civil-Service Law, is the worst blow administered to the reform since the enactment of the Pendleton law by Congress four years ago. The measure has been long and fully discussed, and the action of both the Legislature and the Governor has been taken only after ample opportunity for deliberation upon its significance. Its passage must therefore be considered as expressing the attitude of the men who manage the Republican party in Massachusetts toward the reform cause. The proposition was brought forward in the Massachusetts Legislature a year ago, and was passed by large majorities in each branch. It was supported upon the nominal ground of gratitude to the men who saved the Union, but really as an effective method of attacking the reform system. Fortunately, Gov. Robinson interposed his veto and blocked the scheme, pointing out the duplicity of its advocates and the insidious character of the measure so clearly that it was impossible to rally a two-thirds vote against him. The Republican State Convention last fall ostensibly sustained Gov. Robinson's course, and committed the party against further support of the exemption scheme by adopting a resolution which, after giving hearty support to the Federal and State Civil-Service Acts, said: "We will oppose all open or covert attacks upon them, and encourage no action which tends to impair their efficiency." The spoilsmen in Massachusetts to-day congratulate themselves that a Republican Legislature and Governor have administered what they hope may be a death-blow to the reform.

The Republican Legislature in Massachusetts, having broken the solemn pledges of the party platform to pass a prohibition amendment to the Constitution and to oppose all attacks upon the civil-service reform system, the Boston Journal remarks: "This seems not to be a good year for the maintenance of party promises; and political platforms are apt to pass more than ever into a condition of 'innocuous desuetude' if the precedents set this year of ignoring their provisions are followed in the future." This is quite true, and there is now every prospect that the next Presidential campaign will be fought almost entirely upon the issue of candidates, the advantage resting with that party which shall nominate a man whose own record is his sufficient platform.

The Prohibition advocates in Michigan have scored an important victory in securing the passage through the Legislature of a local-option bill applying to counties. It provides that whenever one-fifth of the voters at the last preceding election for Governor in any county shall petition for a special election to be held on the question of prohibiting the sale of liquor throughout that county, such election shall take place, no other question being voted upon at it. An affirmative vote will establish prohibition in the county. Such election can be held only once in three years, and the decision reached shall be binding during that period. The bill received a very large vote in both houses. It is said that the prohibition partisans repudiate it because it interferes with their prosperity as a party organization. They are probably sound in this objection, for there can be little doubt that the bill will have that effect. According to the vote in the last election, forty-eight of the eighty-three counties in the State are now in favor of prohibition, and under this act they can not only secure it, but, what is far more to the purpose, can enforce it by having public sentiment in its favor.

Michigan is now one of the most advanced States in the Union in the matter of regulating the liquor traffic. Its present tax law levies a uniform tax of $500 upon every wholesale dealer and $300 upon every retail dealer, the proceeds to go into the local treasuries. An amendment to the law has been passed by one house of the present Legislature, and is now pending in the other, which raises the tax to $800 on wholesale dealers and $500 on retail dealers. By adding the local option principle to the uniform State tax, Michigan follows the example of Ohio and Illinois, though her proposed tax is much higher than that of either of those States. Taken together, taxation and local option have been found to work most effectively for both the restriction and suppression of the traffic. Taxation works well where the majority of public sentiment is against prohibition, as it is in all the large cities; and local option easily maintains prohibition in the rural portions of the States. This is a rational and statesmanlike solution of the problem. It could have been reached in this State long ago without the slightest difficulty had the Republican leaders been sincere in their professions of friendliness to temperance legislation.

The Andover trouble has taken a singular shape—such, moreover, as of all imaginable shapes is least likely to satisfy anybody, and happily, therefore, is least likely to be permanent. The Board of Visitors of the Seminary have no original jurisdiction of the subject of removing a professor, their duties in this respect, as prescribed by the Seminary statutes, being to "hear appeals from the Board of Trustees," to "review and revise and reverse any censure passed by said Trustees upon any professor." The constitution of the Seminary provides that "no man shall be continued a professor in this institution who shall not continue to approve himself, to the satisfaction of the Trustees, a man of sound and orthodox principles in divinity," according to the standards established in said constitution; and that, "if at any meeting regularly appointed it should be proved to the satisfaction of a majority of the whole number of the said Trustees, that any professor in this institution has taught or embraced any of the heresies or errors alluded to in the declaration aforesaid, he shall be forthwith removed from office"; and that "every professor in this institution shall be under the immediate inspection of the said Trustees, and shall be by them removed" for neglect of duty, immorality, incapacity, "or any other just and sufficient cause." Nevertheless, in spite of these provisions, the Board of Visitors did allow original proceedings to be taken before them, and they have now brought in their judgment that Prof. Smyth is guilty of heresy concerning matters which he did not write, and must be removed from office, while Profs. Tucker, Churchill, Harris, and Hincks, who did write the inculpated matter, are acquitted, on the ground that one member of the Board "was not present on the day of the hearing on said complaints when said respondents severally appeared and made their statements in defence thereto."

Perhaps it may seem that nothing could be added to this (except, perhaps, by the author of 'Alice in Wonderland' in a peculiarly happy moment), but in fact the Trustees, who had the power of judging, but no charge before them, thought fit to supplement the work of the Visitors, who had charges before them, but no power of judging. As the Trustees say, "We still considered that we were not relieved from the obligation laid upon us by the constitution, and that it was our duty to pass upon the charges made against the professors." "Accordingly," they say, gravely, they "have carefully weighed the evidence . . . presented at the trial," i. e., before another court at another place, "and have sought light from all other accessible sources;" and our judgment is that the charges brought against the professors are not sustained." So the Faculty is pronounced wholly good by the rightful tribunal without a hearing, and partly bad by the wrongful tribunal with a hearing in part. What would have happened if Dr. Eustis had actually heard the defence of the four exonerated professors instead of reading it at his leisure in a verified verbatim report, can only be imagined.

The Cincinnati Commercial Gazette severely castigates the Chicago Tribune for its irreverent treatment of Senator Sherman's notions about sugar duties and sugar bounties. The Tribune objected to the scheme because it believed that Spain would immediately put an export tax on sugar equal to the amount by which our duty is lowered, thus preventing American consumers from getting any benefit from the reduction. The Commercial Gazette replies that this might be met by a discriminating duty on our part against countries that levy an export tax, and then it goes on to expound the benefits of the bounty system, which, it says, would not only compensate the Louisiana planter, but stimulate the production of beet and sorghum sugar in this country to a remarkable degree. We quote one paragraph which strikes us as a melancholy symptom of decrepitude in a newspaper way:

"The United States has any quantity of land admirably adapted for the production of beet and sorghum sugar; and in several States, notably in California and Kansas, this home industry is now flourishing, though in its infancy. Mr. Sherman contends that the same policy in this country would produce the same results, with enormous benefit to almost every State in the Union. A bounty of say one-half to one cent a pound, according to quality, paid directly to the producer of domestic sugar, would probably increase the production four-fold within the period of ten years. Upon the basis of the present production, this bounty would amount to about $3,000,000 or $4,000,000, and if it should in time amount to $12,000,000, there would still be a large revenue from sugar over and above the bounty."

We leave this remarkable sprouting of protectionist conceits in the soil of free trade to notice the Chicago Tribune's objection to Mr. Sherman's project. There is not the slightest danger that Spain will put any greater export tax on sugar than she now imposes, by reason of the reduction of our import duty. She cannot do this without losing the American market. Sugar is now an article of such world-wide production that the very smallest fraction, say a sixteenth of a cent per pound, will determine whether this country shall be supplied by the Spanish islands, or the British islands, or by South America, or by the beet-growing countries of Europe. The world is literally glutted with sugar. There was a time when Western farmers burned their corn for fuel. The only reason why the West Indian planter does not burn his sugar for fuel is that he does not need fuel. The planters of both the Indies, Spanish as well as British, are either bankrupt or on the verge of bankruptcy. None of them can concede the smallest advantage to their competitors in the American market. If Spain should put on a new export tax, she would complete the ruin of the sugar industry in Cuba at once, and would probably have to face a new rebellion in that island. We may therefore act our own pleasure with reference to our sugar duties, and we need not trouble ourselves to devise retaliatory measures against any country on that behalf.

A correspondent, apropos of recent events in the exchanges, asks, "What is the difference between gambling with dice, cards, or roulette tables, and betting on the future prices of wheat and coffee?" The frame of mind of the proposer of this venerable conundrum is apparently that of one who regards the legislative power as an agency for purifying the public morals. Of course a purifier of morals must be consistent with himself. He cannot condemn one form of gambling and wink at another. With him sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. But it is a total misconception of the theory of law to suppose that it deals with morals at all. It concerns itself only with acts. These are indeed the outward manifestations of the moral nature, but a man may be as immoral in thought as you please: the law does not concern itself with him until he does something. Then it asks the question: "Shall I do more harm than good by putting this act under the penalty of fine and imprisonment?" The men who do a strictly gambling business in wheat and coffee cannot be distinguished from those who do a legitimate business. It is neither illegal nor immoral to buy or to sell wheat for future delivery. There are great advantages to both producers and consumers in such trading. In point of fact, the markets are steadied by dealing in futures. Fluctuations are lessened. Other business arrangements which depend upon the price of wheat, and, most of all, the arrangements of those who work for wages, are in a measure protected against uncertainty.

Now, the answer to our correspondent's question is, that whether there is or is not a difference in the arcana of morals between the gambler in wheat and coffee and the gambler with cards, or dice, or roulette, the former cannot be reached by the law without doing more harm than good to society as a whole. The gambler with cards and roulette can be so reached. There are no wise and beneficial social arrangements to be upset in seizing his tools and shutting up his place. All that he does is bad. There is no room for argument concerning any of his doings. The evidence of the badness of his acts is subject to no doubt. There are not two classes doing the same things side by side, one beneficial and proper and the other criminal and degrading. Differences of other kinds exist between the two things—moral differences, we think—but these we shall not now consider because the law does not take cognizance of moral differences when not translated into acts. A large part of the philosophy of Burke, which is more strikingly than anything else in literature the philosophy of Anglo-Saxon law, consists in the wholesale expulsion of what is miscalled "consistency" from the body of legislation. True consistency is the framing of laws for the best ordering of society, and is the result of experience. The consistency which calls for one law merely because another law resembling it exists on the statute-book, and without reference to its effects, is of the kind which Burke hammered to pieces in Parliament, although it still rears its head in the pulpit and the Sunday-school, where, indeed, it properly belongs.

The Union Labor party of the State of New York held a conference at Elmira on Wednesday week, and decided to call a State Convention in August next. The conference consisted of twenty-seven men and one woman, and its deliberations were carefully watched by ten newspaper correspondents and a much larger number of politicians of both "great parties." There was a general atmosphere of suspicion hanging around the meeting. In the first place, the Labor representatives were all more or less suspicious of one another, each being afraid that his associates would sell him and the organization out to some politician or other. Then the friends of Gov. Hill who were on the ground were keeping a sharp eye upon the conference, lest Tom Platt should capture it bodily; and Tom Platt's emissaries were watching the Hill men, lest they bag the game. Then the United Labor party of this city, supposed to be Henry George's property, looked askance at the Conference as an attempt to cut in ahead of them with a similar party name and steal all the Labor thunder. Several suspicious Labor representatives were excluded from the final deliberations, and the Conference exhausted itself by appointing a State Committee, or as much of a one as could be supplied by the size of the party at present.

The new testimony which the counsel for the people presented in the Sharp trial on Friday was very interesting. With Fullgraff's story the public is familiar. After him came a bookkeeper who testified that his firm had received from Fullgraff, in February, 1885, $8,000 in payment of a loan, and that most of it was in $1,000 bills. This is not the first appearance of Aldermen of 1884 with $1,000 bills. Alderman Farley, it will be remembered, testified before the Senate Committee that he started a bank account in 1884, though previous to that period he had kept a bottling establishment and had had no use for such an account. He remembered that after starting it he frequently received and deposited $1,000 bills. "How many were there?" "Oh, I suppose about twenty." There were also several $500 bills. He got five or ten of the $1,000 bills from a "young man in Ludlow Street Jail, named Billy Jones," and four or five $500 bills. Billy was the engineer of the jail, and Farley had got him his place. Where Billy got them he didn't know. He merely brought them to him to be changed. "I knew Billy was straight as a string, and so I never asked him where he got them. I supposed he was obliging some wealthy prisoners who were confined in the jail." Farley also received "fifteen or twenty $1,000 bills" from William Hall, a liquor-dealer, now dead. Billy Jones subsequently testified that he frequently got large bills changed for visitors to the jail. In fact, he was so accustomed to handling bills of large denominations that the simple fact of a total stranger calling him up from the cellar and asking him to run out and get change for a $1,000 bill, made no impression upon him.

Other interesting evidence on Friday was that of an ex-clerk of the Assembly, who testified that Sharp had personally offered him $5,000 to make a change in the General Railroad Act of 1883; and that of Col. George Bliss, one of Sharp's counsel, who testified that a false entry had been made upon the books of the Seventh Avenue Railway Company, charging him with receiving $11,500 for services from that company. His services had been paid for by Richmond with $1,500 in cash and ten $1,000 bonds of the Broadway Company. This is the second time in which false entries have been discovered upon the books of the Seventh Avenue Railway Company. The first was the use made of the $500,000 mortgage placed upon the road for the avowed purpose of enlarging its depot and extending its facilities. This mortgage was sold for cash, the money was placed in a safe-deposit vault, no entry of its sale was made upon the books of the company at the time, but subsequently a false entry was made, first as "sundries," and afterwards this was erased and "proceeds of bonds" was written over it

We doubt if the people of this city realize fully the importance of the experiment which Mayor Hewitt is making in the City Hall. He is trying with great sagacity and pluck to give us a local government conducted upon honest principles. He is greatly hampered by his limited powers; for so long as we consent to be governed mainly from Albany, no Mayor can do more than show us what might be done if we were trusted to govern ourselves. But he is doing a great deal to call attention to the enormous expense which our present system entails upon us, and that is a service of no slight value. There is one class of the community which ought especially to support the Mayor's efforts, and that is the large one composed of salaried and other men of moderate means. Their only hope of an easier living lies in the success of the kind of government which Mr. Hewitt is trying to give us—that is, a government conducted upon the same principles which every merchant observes in the conduct of his business. Government by "halls" means the support at the public expense of a vast army of incompetents, loafers, and thieves; and the cost of this support falls finally upon the rent-payers of all degrees. Mr. Hewitt, as a business man of great ability and experience, sees that employees of this sort ought no more to be tolerated in public than they are in private service, and is doing his utmost to drive them out. It is almost impossible to overestimate the saving to the city which would ensue, could his efforts in this direction be entirely successful. The political leaders of the various "halls" and their subordinates at present upon the pay-rolls of the city draw at least one million dollars a year in salaries. As they give not only the larger part of their time and energy to "politics," but also contribute a large percentage of their salaries to the expenses of elections, they are forced to recoup themselves from the city treasury in various ways, including inefficient service, exorbitant pay, and support of all kinds of "jobs." Business principles applied to them and their work, business principles applied in the same way to all branches of the city service—that is, the securing for the city the best possible return for its outlay—would make the problem of living in New York a much less burdensome one than it is to every man of moderate means to-day.

It is a significant fact that of 111 members of the graduating class at Yale College who define their political standing, 19, or almost one fifth, report themselves as Mugwumps. It is probable that the proportion of Independents is about as large as this among educated young voters generally, and, however much the political managers may ridicule them, their votes count just as much as those of thick-and-thin partisans.

Mr. Blaine is experiencing in England some of the difficulties which are likely to beset his whole tour in Europe. He has to satisfy his American supporters, of the "capitalistic" school, that he is regarded in Europe as one of the greatest men who ever appeared in either hemisphere. Now, the only way this can be proved is by invitations from monarchs and noblemen to "banquets" and other festivities. But it is plain that if Mr. Blaine accepts such invitations, he will lose standing with "Labor" and the Irish. Accordingly, we find that while his capitalistic friends are desirous of seeing him seated on the Queen's right hand in Westminster Abbey, and the chief guest at all the jubilee banquets, he is not able to go to any of the fêtes, but has to keep close in his lodgings. Moreover, if he speaks anywhere in England and does not say a word for home rule under the nose of the Saxons, what will the Irish say of him? If, on the other hand, he does say a word for home rule, what will the nobility, gentry, and clergy think of him? The situation is a most trying one for a man of sensitive nature. It will hardly be improved when he goes on the Continent. It will not do when there to hob-nob with military monarchs, for that would damn him with Labor also. Nor will it do not to hob-nob with them, for this would destroy the theory that all classes on the Continent have been waiting for him with hushed and respectful eagerness, which compels the rulers to run about after him. It looks as if he would have to confine himself to the society of his brother historians, Mommsen, and Curtius, and the like; but he will find this awfully dull.

Nothing can well be odder than the attention paid in England to "Buffalo Bill," or, as he is there known, "Colonel the Hon. William F. Cody." He is literally the great lion of the season in London. He is an honored guest at the fashionable parties, invited out to dinner everywhere, and passes a good deal of his time in the company of royal personages. In fact, he has had a far more flattering reception than any foreigner without official rank or antecedents to help him. Garibaldi was much less favorably received, although he was, when he went to England, one of the most famous and romantic heroes of the day. Cody's social success, like that of Fred Archer the jockey, marks the enormous space which pure amusement now occupies in the life of the well-to-do classes in England. The number of people who follow amusement as a business has probably increased ten-fold during the last forty years, and the place of people who furnish amusement has been correspondingly exalted. Americans of any grade or species who can do this are especially successful in London society. Their stories, their jokes, their songs, their new card tricks, their skill in poker and euchre, sometimes supply the place, in giving them social consideration, of nearly everything else which makes a human being respectable. We by no means wish to underrate Buffalo Bill's character or capacity in his line, but it seems very odd to see the highest circles of a civilized nation paying to the proprietor of an equestrian show all the honor it could bestow, and far more than the honor it would bestow, on a great author, or inventor, or statesman. A large number of those who are fêting Buffalo Bill are, in fact, taking pains to inflict slights and insults on Mr. Gladstone whenever they get an opportunity.

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S NEWS.

WEDNESDAY, June 15, to TUESDAY, June 21, 1887, inclusive.]

DOMESTIC.

THE President gave verbal assent to a proposition, which was suggested by Adjt.-Gen. Drum, to return the Confederate battle-flags now in the War Department at Washington to the Governors of the States from whose troops they were captured. This order provoked indignant expressions from Gen. Fairchild, Commander of the Grand Army of the Republic, from many posts, and from the Governors of several Northern States. Before it was executed—on June 16—the President revoked it, expressing the opinion "that the return of these flags in the manner thus contemplated is not authorized by existing law, nor justified as an executive act."

A postal treaty between the United States and Mexico was signed by the President June 21, which provides that the same rate of postage shall be charged on mail matter from either country to the other as each charges on domestic mail matter. It will take effect July 1.

Gov. Ames of Massachusetts, on June 16, signed the bill "giving preference in appointments to office in the State to honorably-discharged soldiers and sailors, without civil service examination." The same bill was passed last year and vetoed by the Governor. It is regarded by the civil-service reformers as a severe blow to the reform in the State. The Massachusetts Legislature adjourned June 16.

The famous ecclesiastical trial of members of the Faculty of Andover Theological Seminary, provoked chiefly by the controversy about the doctrine of future probation, was ended, for the present at least, by the decision of the Board of Visitors on June 17. Prof. Egbert C. Smyth was declared guilty of heresy, but the four other professors, Churchill, Harris, Hincks, and Tucker, who share Prof. Smyth's view about future probation for the heathen, were not declared guilty, because the chairman of the Board of Visitors was absent when their cases were heard. The Board of Trustees, with one dissenting voice, has upheld Prof. Smyth. The case will be carried to the Supreme Court of Massachusetts to determine whether or not these "heretical" professors have violated the conditions under which the institution was endowed. This technical compromise of the case has brought the ecclesiastical quarrel no nearer to a settlement than it was before.

The discussion of the usual method of teaching children arithmetic, begun some time ago by Prof. Francis A. Walker, has caused the Board of Boston Public Schools to reduce the time given to it and to order a simpler way of teaching it.

The Governor of New York on June 20 signed the bill that makes it unlawful for any steam railroad, after May 1, 1888, "to heat its passenger cars on other than mixed trains by any stove or furnace kept inside the cars, or suspended therefrom, except in case of accident or other emergency."

The Secretary of the State Board of Health of New York has been obliged to insist on the local boards' making more nearly complete returns of vital statistics. Although this is of the utmost importance, there is a strong tendency to neglect it.

The Board of Aldermen of this city passed an amendment to the ordinance that prohibits the discharge of fireworks, whereby July 4 should be excepted, and Mayor Hewitt has vetoed the amendment.

There was a conference at Elmira, June 15, of representatives of the Union Labor party in this State to make preparations for issuing a call for a State Convention. This declaration was made: "Be it known to all people that we, the undersigned, have severed our connection with all political parties, and that we will not give our influence or vote to any party except the Union Labor party, and we will support its principles as promulgated at Cincinnati, O., on February 22, 1887. We further assert that we do not hold any appointment from any political party, and hereby declare that we will not do so until we publicly sever our connection with said Union Labor party." The suspicion has found free expression in the Democratic and Independent papers that the leaders in this conference are preparing to make a "deal" with the Republican party in the State.

There was a long parade of working people in this city on Saturday night, June 18, in honor of Dr. McGlynn, the deposed priest. The resolutions adopted by the crowd declare "that we firmly protest against interference in American politics by any foreign power, whether civil or ecclesiastical, and that we denounce with especial indignation the arbitrary, unjust, and tyrannical attempt to interfere with the civil rights of the Rev. Dr. Edward McGlynn, to whom, with one heart, we pledge our devoted and unwavering support."

After consuming more than a fortnight in filling the jurors' seats, the trial of Jacob Sharp for bribing New York Aldermen to grant the franchise of the Broadway Railroad Company in 1884 has been begun. On Friday afternoon the defendant was taken to Ludlow Street Jail and confined in the room which Tweed occupied. The time of the court has thus far been consumed in hearing witnesses for the prosecution. The General Term of the Supreme Court on June 18 handed down a decision in the case of ex-Alderman John O'Neil, convicted of bribery, which affirms the judgment of the lower court.

Mr. Junius S. Morgan, the well-known American banker in London, has presented to the Metropolitan Museum of Art in this city a painting by Sir Joshua Reynolds which he purchased for £10,000. It is the portraits of Henry Fane, Charles Blair, and Irving Jones, trustees of the tenth Earl of Westmoreland, for whom it was painted.

Both branches of the Michigan Legislature have passed a county local-option bill, whereby any county can vote for a prohibitory law.

A new $1,000,000 3½ per cent. loan by the State of Connecticut was taken June 20, half by the Ætna Life Insurance Company at 103.27, and half by the Williamsburgh Savings Bank of Brooklyn, N. Y., at 102.55, and all the bids that were made aggregated nearly $7,000,000.

A soldiers' and sailors' monument was dedicated at New Haven, June 17. It is of Hallowell granite, 110 feet high, upon which stands a bronze statue, representing an Angel of Peace. The site is on the summit of East Rock, 400 feet above the city's level, or 526 feet above the level of the sea. At the base of the structure are statues representing Prosperity, History, Victory, and Patriotism. A speech was made by President Dwight of Yale, and the principal oration was by the Rev. Dr. Newman Smyth. On the same day a soldiers' monument at Arlington, Mass., was dedicated. On June 18 there was a celebration of the battle of Valley Forge, on the battlefield, by the Patriotic Order of Sons of America.

The Union Labor party in Kentucky on June 18 nominated for Governor A. H. Cargin, for Lieutenant-Governor O. N. Bradburn, for Attorney-General John P. Newman, for Treasurer George Smith, for Auditor John McMurtry, for Superintendent of Public Instruction R. M. McBeath. The Prohibition, Republican, and Democratic parties each had before nominated full State tickets.

A suit was begun in the Circuit Court in Chicago, June 17, by a contractor against a "walking delegate" of a painters' union, to recover damages caused by a strike which the delegate ordered.

The breaking of a "corner" in wheat in Chicago caused the bankruptcy of C. J. Kershaw & Co., and several smaller firms, and led on June 21 to the suspension of the Fidelity National Bank in Cincinnati.

William J. McGarigle, warden, and E. S. McDonald, engineer, of the Cook County (Ill.) Hospital, were convicted, June 18, of conspiracy to defraud the county, by making fraudulent charges for supplies, and sentenced to three years' imprisonment in the State Penitentiary. These are the first convictions in the notorious "boodlers'" cases in Chicago. McGarigle, in the early part of the Cleveland Administration, was the candidate of the Democratic politicians for United States Marshal for the Northern District of Illinois. Few applicants for any office had stronger or more numerous recommendations, and among his persistent friends were seven of the Democratic Representatives from Illinois.

The Supreme Court of Missouri has fixed August 12 as the day for the execution of H. M. Brooks (or "Maxwell"), the Englishman who murdered his companion in a St. Louis hotel in 1885, and was captured in Australia. The condemned man's attorneys hope yet to bring the case before the Supreme Court of the United States.

Ascent was made at St. Louis in a balloon equipped by the New York World, June 17, with the hope of reaching the Atlantic coast. The aeronauts were compelled to land at Hoffman, Illinois, on the first night of their voyage, because the gas gave out. An effort will be made to ascend again.

A large number of Hungarian workmen at the coke ovens in Pennsylvania have gone to work again, and the long strike which caused a great scarcity of coke is broken. The negroes near Laurens, S. C., have formed a secret organization to demand a dollar a day for farm work, and, it is reported, threaten murder if necessary to obtain it. The whites have organized a cavalry company for protection, and trouble is feared.

A regular train from Altoona to Pittsburgh was run June 17 by the use of petroleum as fuel, and the experiment was pronounced so successful as to warrant the belief that petroleum for this use will in a great measure take the place of coal, by reason of economy, as well as freedom from smoke and cinder.

A passenger train was robbed on the night of June 17 on the Southern Pacific Railway near Schulenburg, Tex. Two robbers forced the engineer to stop the train where their accomplices awaited it, and money and valuables to the amount of $10,000, it is reported, were taken from the express messenger and the passengers.

The Mormons have issued a call for a Constitutional Convention to meet in Salt Lake City June 30, to call a convention to apply for the admission of Utah into the Union.

Bryant B. Crandall, formerly a resident of Buffalo, N. Y., who disappeared at Niagara Falls more than a year ago, leaving a letter in which he declared he was about to commit suicide, was arrested in Salem, Oregon, June 16, for defrauding insurance companies. A body was found soon after his disappearance which was identified as his, and a large amount of insurance on his life had been paid.

On the night of June 16, the steamer Champlain caught fire off Charlevoix, northern Michigan, and was burned before it could reach land. There were fifty-seven persons, passengers and crew, on board, and of these but twenty-seven are known to be saved. The fire spread so rapidly that they were panic-stricken and perished in the water. On June 13, ninety miles east of Sand Island Light, Fla., the steamship Vidette from New York, with a cargo of merchandise for Mobile, sprang a leak, and was abandoned by the crew. The vessel sank, but all the men were landed safely.

The Rev. Dr. Mark Hopkins, who was from 1836 to 1872 President of Williams College, died at Williamstown, Mass., June 17, in his eighty-sixth year. On the evening before, the Rev. Dr. Roswell D. Hitchcock, President of the Union Theological Seminary, died, aged seventy-seven. Benjamin F. Potts, Governor of Montana from 1870 to 1883, died in Helena June 17, in his fifty-third year. On the same day O. A. Lochrane, formerly Chief Justice of Georgia, and one of the most prominent lawyers in the South, died at his home in Atlanta.

Prof. Jonathan Pearson, who has been connected with Union College as tutor or professor for half a century, died June 20. Dr. Woolsey Johnson, Health Commissioner of this city, died June 21, aged forty-five.

FOREIGN.

The celebration of the Jubilee of Queen Victoria's reign was an event some features of which were without a parallel in history. She rode in an open carriage from Buckingham Palace to Westminster Abbey June 21, escorted by her sons, sons-in-law, and grandsons as a guard of honor. The special service in the Abbey was witnessed by 10,000 persons of distinction. All the reigning houses in Europe sent representatives with congratulations, and messages and presents were received from all parts of the world. To Mr. Phelps, the United States Minister, a private audience was granted when he delivered the President's letter of congratulation. The decorations in London and the festivities in all the larger English cities were beyond precedent. The day was celebrated in the most remote British colonies and in the chief cities of the United States. In this city a Jubilee service was held in Trinity Church on Sunday, and on Tuesday there was a large meeting in the Metropolitan Opera-house, where appropriate speeches were made.

In the House of Commons, June 16, Mr. Dillon moved to adjourn the committee in order to call the attention of the House to the Bodyke evictions. The Government, he said, had refused to appoint a committee to inquire into the matter. He was, therefore, bound to demand an open discussion in Parliament. The eviction of thirty-five families had disclosed features of the greatest harshness. In the debate which followed, Mr. Balfour, Mr. Morley, Mr. Matthews, Sir William Vernon Harcourt, and Lord Randolph Churchill participated, and Mr. Dillon's motion was rejected. Several of the tenants who were arrested for resisting evictions have been sentenced to hard labor in prison for terms ranging from one to three months. On the way to prison, June 18, a crowd of their sympathizers made such a demonstration that the police hurt several persons with their clubs. On June 20 a justice of the peace, while driving near Killarney, was fired at by some person in ambush and his horse was wounded. Mr. O'Brien, on his arrival at Dublin from his trip to Canada and the United States, was received with a great demonstration.

At ten o'clock on the evening of June 17, while the sixth clause of the Irish Crimes Bill was under discussion in the House of Commons, in committee, according to previous notice the question was put on this clause, and the remaining fourteen clauses, without discussion, were put and carried, and the bill passed the committee stage. The Gladstonians and Parnellites withdrew. The scene was similar to that on the second reading of the bill, when Mr. Gladstone and his followers left the House, but was not so exciting. There were cheers, disorderly, indignant cries, and a few amusing personal incidents. The Government's rude advancement of the bill was a use of sheer force by a majority, which may be an embarrassing precedent.

At the regular fortnightly meeting of the Irish National League at Dublin, June 20, Mayor T. D. Sullivan said that he believed that they were on the eve of witnessing the suppression of the League under the operation of the Coercion Act; but that the Parliamentary party could not be suppressed. John Dillon said that there were some Irishmen who did not think the "Plan of Campaign" advanced enough, but he would not advise any further advance merely to suit the malicious convenience of the Coercion Government. Timothy Harrington referred to the general idea prevailing that the League should issue its manifesto directing the people how to meet the enforcement of the coercion measures. They were, he said, prepared to meet the Coercion Act, inch by inch, but he did not consider it wise, at this early stage, to tell their opponents just how they were going to fight the act.

In the House of Commons, June 20, Sir Henry Holland, Secretary of State for the Colonies, announced that the Governor of Sierra Leone had informed the Government that the French flag had been hoisted at Badibu, on the Gambia River. While not under the British protectorate, Badibu is within the sphere of British influence, and the British and French Governments are exchanging despatches on the subject.

Turkey has proposed to modify the new Convention with England about Egypt, so as to provide for Turkish occupation of Egypt in the event of disorders occurring after the British occupation has terminated. The Marquis of Salisbury has refused to consent to such a modification.

At the Cambridge (England) University examinations Miss Ramsey of Girton, daughter of Sir James Ramsey of Banff, is the only person who has reached the dignity of senior classic. The only person placed in the first class in the mediæval modern languages examination is Miss Hervey of Newnham. Two other ladies, Miss Pocock and Miss Powell, have reached the first class in the second part of the examinations.

The German Reichstag adjourned June 18. The imperial message closing the session expressed the Emperor's grateful appreciation of the labors and decisions of the body, and concluded as follows: "You have by your diligent and faithful labors justified the confidence with which the country sent you here in order to promote and assure its welfare and peace." The revenue from the new spirits and sugar duties will more than cover the increased army expenditures, the spirit tax alone increasing the Treasury receipts 150,000,000 marks.

Herr Kraker, a Socialist member of the Reichstag, was arrested the moment he left the legislative building after the closing of the session.

Sentence was passed, June 18, on the citizens of Alsace-Lorraine who were found guilty of treason at Leipzig, and the President of the Court declared that the object of the French Patriotic League was plainly the reconquest of Alsace-Lorraine by an armed force, involving a war of revenge; and that persons who became members shared the designs of the League, and, if German subjects, they were guilty of high treason.

This has provoked indignant expressions from the Parisian newspapers, and the League itself protests strongly against the sentences, and has issued a circular, twitting the Germans with being as actively engaged in the work of espionage as they accuse the French of being. Friends of the convicted men have signed an appeal to President Grévy to intervene for the release of one of them sentenced to a year's imprisonment in a fortress.

Uneasiness is yet felt on account of the malady of the Crown Prince of Germany. He does not speak except in a whisper.

While a party of 400 pilgrims were crossing the Danube River near Paks, June 17, the boat was caught in a hurricane and capsized. Only a few of them were saved, and more than 200 bodies have been recovered.

The floods in Hungary are subsiding, but there is great distress among the inhabitants of the inundated regions. Fifteen hundred farmers are reported to be bankrupt, and the entire damage is estimated at $5,000,000.

A mob set fire, June 19, to the Jewish quarter of the town of Duna-Szerdahely in Hungary, and 125 families were made homeless.

The French Chamber of Deputies, June 18, passed clause first of the Army Bill, which declares it to be the duty of every Frenchman to perform military service.

United States Minister McLane has demanded of M. Flourens, French Minister of Foreign Affairs, the release of Baron Raymond Sellière, brother of Princess Sagan, who was recently placed in a lunatic asylum by his relatives. The Baron declared his intentions while in the United States some time ago of becoming a citizen of this country, and this declaration, Minister McLane holds, is sufficient reason why he should have the protection of this country abroad.

The Countess Martinez Campos, a young Cuban heiress who had been divorced, was seized by two men while she was walking with a companion on a street in Paris on June 16, and the French capital enjoyed a sensational kidnapping story for two days. Then it was discovered that the lady herself had arranged to be thus captured, and the kidnapping was an elopement.

The Spanish Senate on June 20 voted $50,000 towards the erection of a statue to the late King Alfonso in front of the palace, the public to contribute the balance.

By an order of the Government Council at Ottawa, to give "to natural features in the Northwest, as is fit and proper, the names of persons more intimately connected with the inception and execution of the Canadian national highway," the names of five of the Rocky Mountains are changed: Boundary Peak to Pope's Peak, after the Minister of Railways; Mount Hermit to Mount Tupper, after the Minister of Finance; Mount Carroll to Mount Macdonald, after the Premier; Mount Cunningham to Mount McKenzie, after the ex-Premier, and an unnamed mountain is to be called Mount Macpherson.

Passengers by the Canadian Pacific route from Yokohama arrived at New York June 20, having made the trip in twenty days.

The Dominion Government has decided to grant a subsidy of $50,000 annually for a line of steamers between France and Canada. The route is to be to the St. Lawrence River in summer and to Halifax in winter, and during the first two years there will be one trip every twenty days during the navigation of the St. Lawrence, and a trip every month during the winter season, and the rest of the time fortnightly.

The Board of Trade of Toronto, Ont., concluded its discussion of commercial union with the United States, June 16, by declaring that, while increased trade with the United States is desirable, Canadians cannot assent to discrimination against Great Britain without her consent. Several more Farmers' Institutes in Canada have passed a resolution favoring commercial union with the United States.

It is reported that by the aid of subsidies from the Canadian, Hawaiian, and Australian Governments, a Pacific submarine cable will be laid from Vancouver, by way of the Sandwich and Fiji Islands, to Australia. It is estimated that it will cost $10,000,000.

News was brought by a steamer which arrived at San Francisco from Honolulu June 16, that there was imminent danger of a revolution in the Hawaiian kingdom. King Kalakaua, it is reported, never goes out now without a body-guard. A large supply of powder and ammunition has been stored in the palace, and port-holes made in walls about it behind which cannon stand. It is expected that the kingdom will be overthrown, and trade in consequence has greatly fallen off.

On June 20th 9,000 rifles, 65,000 cartridges, 25,000 primers, 6,000 bullets, 2 cases of shot, and 4 cases of revolvers were shipped from San Francisco to Honolulu, consigned to a firm of brokers.

THE BATTLE-FLAG FLURRY.

It is undoubtedly before all things desirable that such memories of the war as divide the North from the South should die out as speedily as possible, seeing that the object of the war was peace and unity. But then, in trying to extinguish them, one has to take care that the process is as agreeable to one side as to the other, and that it is seasonable. Reconciliation, to be effective, has to be mutual. For this reason Charles Sumner made a mistake in moving in the Senate, in 1862 and 1872, to have the names of the victories won against the Confederates removed from the regimental colors of the United States troops, on the ground that they were victories over fellow-citizens, inasmuch as the victors were not ready for any such display of magnanimity, and were therefore irritated by the proposal. In other words, the effect he produced was the exact opposite of what he intended, and his action was censured by the Legislature of his own State. The President has just made a similar mistake in ordering or permitting the return of the Confederate battle-flags to the States from whose forces they were captured. Nothing is truer than that no great people has ever long continued to prize trophies won in civil strife. The day will surely come when Americans will cease to treasure memorials of the humiliation and defeat of a large body of their own countrymen, which is what captured rebel colors really are. But we fear the day has not come yet, and that in consenting to surrender them, without any special demand or occasion for it, the President has done more to supply the "bloody shirt" screamers with material for execrations than the Southerners with reasons for loving the restored Union. Captured colors, we admit, differ from soldiers' monuments and the like, in being the civilized equivalent of scalps; but they are nevertheless things which every man who has served in the field and feels military traditions, prizes highly, and we think the part of wisdom would have been—as it has been the sober second thought of the President—to let the Confederate colors stay where they are a little longer, or until the reign of peace in the hearts of the "soldier element" in politics is somewhat more complete.

The awful cursing in which Gen. Fairchild indulged on hearing the news at the meeting of a Grand Army post last week in this city, gives a foretaste of the use which will be made of the order, in spite of its having been revoked. He shouted for God Almighty to help him in this matter by killing the President with two strokes of paralysis, one in the hand and the second in the brain, as if God Almighty had not done enough in this line by permitting the slaughter of 300,000 young men in the four years between 1861 and 1865. We suggest now that if there has to be any further loss of life in this quarrel, Gen. Fairchild should do his own killing. If he or any other veteran thinks the President ought to die for restoring the captured flags, he must not blasphemously call on God to slay him, but step up like a man and assassinate him himself. If anything can justify the President's course, however, it would be talk like this. People will naturally say that things which call forth such ravings must be excusable, that it cannot be far wrong to do for peace and good-will what fanatics resent in this fashion.

Happily, it can be seen already that there will be no unfortunate sequel to the affair. So far from leading to the apprehended sectional bitterness, the incident seems likely to end in showing more conclusively than anything which has happened before, how thoroughly the Union has been restored, and how far both North and South have grown away from the old era of strife. The spirit manifested by the representative men and journals of the South is converting the President's mistake into a means of illustrating the loyalty and patriotism of that section in the most conspicuous possible way. What the bloody-shirt people wanted was, in the first place, evidence that the South had been insisting upon the return of the flags; and, in the second place, the raising of the "rebel yell" when it found that it could not get them. Instead of this it has been made clear that the South did not ask for the flags, and does not want them, unless they are returned, as a number of flags have already been by Northern military organizations, with the hearty assent of those who captured them. "This request did not originate with the Southern people," said Gov. Lee of Virginia as soon as he heard of the Northern protest; "they recognized that these are the property of the victors, and were content to let them remain in their charge." And he disposed of the attempt to make a row over the affair thus: "The country should not again be agitated by pieces of bunting that mean nothing now. The South is part and parcel of the Union to-day, and means to do her part towards increasing its prosperity and maintaining the peace of the republic, whether the flags rot in Washington or are restored to their former custodians." In like manner Gen. Gordon of Georgia, while confessing the satisfaction with which he had received the suggestion, said that, in view of the Northern protest, he personally would prefer to leave the flags where they are, and that he believed that "this will be found to be the sense and sentiment of the Southern people. We are weary of strife and hate. We want peace and good-will, and prefer these to a return of even so cherished relics, if their return is to be made at such cost."

The leading Southern newspapers treat the subject in the same manner. The Atlanta (Ga.) Constitution says that if the flags had been sent in a generous spirit, the South would have received them in the same spirit, and "would have accepted them as a solemn pledge that the last spark of resentment between the two best armies the sun ever shone on had died out for ever." But it says that the South does not want them if the North resents their return, or if they come from churlish or unwilling hands. And it concludes an article in which there is nothing for any patriotic Northern man to criticise, with these words: "Let the North keep them if she wants them. The peace and good-will their return would hasten will come to this people in God's time and in God's way at last. The voice of the American people will be heard above the noisy protests of the hot-headed or cold-hearted when the day comes for the people to speak. The great American heart can neither be misled nor deterred. It has determined that there shall be peace. The last sectional President of this republic has been elected, and for the last time has a great party entered a campaign under a sectional flag. The war is over—its results are fixed—its passions are dead; and its heroism and sacrifices have bound this people together as they were never bound before."

Even such a Republican Bourbon as Senator Hoar appears to perceive that the day of the bloody shirt is past. In an address of welcome to the R. E. Lee Camp of Confederate veterans from Richmond, Va., at Faneuil Hall on Friday evening, the Massachusetts Senator thus disposed of the rubbish about the Southerners being "the same old rebels:" "Your presence to-night is a token that the memories of four years cannot efface the memories of 300. Terrible as was the cost of those years to both sides, I think either would be slow to wish them blotted from our history. We have learned respect for each other. You have learned something of the Puritan. . . . We too have learned to know as we never knew before the quality of the noble Southern stock: what courage in war; what attachment to home and State; what capacity for great affection and generous emotion; what aptness for command; above all, what constancy—that virtue beyond all virtues, without which no people can long be either great or free. After all, the fruit of this vine has a flower not to be found in other gardens. In the great and magnificent future which is before our country, you are to contribute a large share both of strength and of ornament. Mr. Secretary Lamar, in his oration at the unveiling of the statue of Calhoun at Charleston, for which I am happy to take this occasion to express my admiration, does not exaggerate when he declares that the late appeal to arms 'has led to the indissolubility of the American Union and the universality of American freedom.'"

THE INTER-STATE COMMERCE DECISION.

The whole batch of cases before the Inter-State Commerce Commission arising under the long-and-short-haul clause, except a few unimportant ones, have been cleared off the docket by the decision just rendered, that competition is one of the "circumstances and conditions" to be taken into account in determining whether a railroad may carry at lower rates for a long haul than for a short one. The decision is not only reasonable in itself, but it is the only practicable decision—that is, it is the only one which would enable the Commission to get through with its appointed work at all. It is plain that the multitude of cases arising under the fourth section of the law could not possibly be heard in advance. The ninety days within which a suspension of the operation of the clause had been granted to every road that could make out a good case prima facie, were about expiring. The time had come to decide each case on its merits after investigation. The only way to get on at all was to do what has been done—namely, to declare what view the Commission had taken of the intent of the disputed clause, and then authorize the roads to follow this interpretation, taking the risk of making the right application of it in particular cases. The substance of the decision is found in the fifth paragraph of the opinion rendered, viz.:

"Fifth. That the existence of actual competition which is of controlling force in respect to traffic important in amount, may make out the dissimilar circumstances and conditions entitling the carrier to charge less for the longer than for the shorter haul over the same line in the same direction, the shorter being included in the longer in the following cases:

"(1.) When the competition is with carriers by water which are not subject to the provisions of the statute.

"(2.) When the competition is with foreign or other railroads which are not subject to the provisions of the statute.

"(3.) In rare and peculiar cases of competition between railroads which are subject to the statute, when a strict application of the general rule of the statute would be destructive of competition."

The principle which the Commission have taken for their guidance in construing the law is, that it could not have been the intent of Congress to destroy competition where it exists. But any ruling which should practically compel the railroads to abandon traffic wholly to the water lines or to foreign carriers, would abolish competition. So also, in a more limited sense, would a ruling which should have the effect to give all the business between two points to one line of road where now there are two or more lines competing for it. Every such case must be judged by itself when objection is made, but the principle upon which the particular decision will be made will be, that monopoly in carrying shall not be favored, but that competition, where it actually exists, shall be preserved. This is good economic doctrine and good American doctrine. We believe that it will stand in the courts of law, and in the forum of public opinion as well.

In an article contributed by Prof. A. T. Hadley to the Independent, that careful observer says:

"The Inter State Commerce Law was intended as a protest against the practice of the railroads in making their rates a matter of special bargain between the freight agent and the individual shipper. It was not the tariffs which furnished the ground of complaint, it was the deviation from those tariffs. The schedule rates might favor some localities to the detriment of others; but these differences were slight when compared to the secret rebates which were not in the schedule, and which favored certain individuals to the ruin of their rivals. The act clearly forbids this, and in so doing it is welcomed not merely by the public, but by the better class of railroad men. They were glad of the chance to put a stop to the system of special bargains, which was bad for public morals, and generally bad for the permanent interests of the railroads themselves."

He might have added that some of the largest fortunes accumulated by railroad managers in this country have been derived from these "secret rebates" from which the stockholders of the companies derived no advantage. The opportunities offered for swindling the real owners of the property, while working the most grievous injustice to individuals and localities, have been innumerable. That they have been availed of to a shocking extent, is known to the honest as well as to the dishonest class of railway officers. It was high time that something were done to put an end to these abuses. The Commerce Act seemed likely to do much more. The secret rebates abolished competition to a certain extent; the act appeared to abolish it to a still greater extent. The ruling of the Commission on the long-and-short-haul clause renders it possible to correct the one abuse without introducing another.

The argument by which the decision of the Commission is sustained is exceedingly strong, and cannot fail to make its due impression upon Congress. It was shown in the debates in the Senate that wide differences of opinion existed as to the interpretation of the fourth section. Some members voted for it because they believed it meant one thing, while others voted for it because they believed it meant the opposite, and still others voted for it because they did not know what it meant, but hoped that it would be interpreted in the most beneficial way, whatever that might be. We think that the Commission have found the most useful as well as the most reasonable construction, and that Congress will not controvert it without a sufficient trial of its practical working.

SOME BEARINGS OF THE ANDOVER DECISION.

It is well understood, we suppose, that ecclesiastical politics had a great deal to do with the trial of the Andover professors. Their offence was magnified far beyond the importance that would have attached to it had they not been representatives of a party in their denomination. Indeed, it is more than likely that they would not have been proceeded against at all, certainly not by the men who actually were their prosecutors, or in the way in which the accusation was brought, if it had not been thought imperative to rebuke and suppress the growing number for whom the professors had come to stand. The selection of the Board of Visitors as the tribunal before which the charges were urged, instead of the natural body of resort in the first instance, the Trustees, looked unfortunately like the politicians' habit of having their cases heard before a court which they feel sure they "own." And now the outcome of the process betrays some features which, were they present in a matter purely secular, would be called something very like sharp practice.

It was a strange thing, to begin with, that such a long and vexatious delay in reaching a decision should have followed the trial. For trained theologians, as two at least of the Visitors are, it certainly could not have required months to determine the simple question whether the theological position of the professors, so frankly declared, was the same as the theological requirements of the creed under which they held office. A stranger thing still is that the decision, once reached, June 4, should have been kept from the parties interested and from the public for two weeks. That it was held back until the close of the seminary year, until after the meetings of alumni and Trustees, will not fail to have its significance in the eyes of those who do not think the managers of the conservatives to be lacking in craft. Then there is the surprising acquittal of the four professors, owing to the fact that one of the majority opposed to Prof. Smyth was absent on the day when they presented their statements, although he knew perfectly what their statements were, and how entirely they identified their case with that of their colleague, and although it was distinctly understood that the trial could go on in his absence exactly for the reason that the case of Prof. Smyth was the case of all. Did Dr. Eustis think that it was necessary to make an example, and so vote to depose Prof. Smyth, while his regard for the interests of the Seminary led him to rely upon a doubtful technicality for the purpose of preventing the calamity of five empty chairs at once? There may be some who will so conclude; but others, and with better reason, we think, will see in all this a very clever move. The Trustees, be it remembered, are twelve to one for the new theology. They stand by the professors openly. Now, the Visitors have only the power of confirmation in the election of new professors. The Trustees are the appointing body. What advantage would it be to the Visitors to throw the nomination of five new professors into the hands of new-theology Trustees? How much better to leave four of them in their chairs, if they are content to stay there under a virtual condemnation—leave them there, if they stay, either intimidated into silence hereafter or robbed of their influence if they speak.

But the game played in this way is still deeper. It has been well understood that the professors had friends to back them possessed both of conviction and wealth. It has been more than hinted that if the result of the trial should be to eject the accused men from their chairs in Andover, funds would immediately be at their disposal to found a new seminary without the Andover fetters. All the leading churches in Boston, with one exception, are for the new theology, and would support its teachers if they were to be driven out of Andover. The manner of the decision now announced looks very much as if designed to checkmate such a scheme. Prof. Smyth will have to found his new seminary by himself. Or, if his colleagues resign to go with him, their views will be stamped from the start as not only heretical but wilful. In other words, the Visitors (always meaning their majority) do not propose to launch the new seminary fully equipped.

Meanwhile, the prospect for Andover is not a pleasing one except for those who enjoy theological squabbles. The professors announce their determination to stand together and to stay in the Seminary, pending the decision of the Supreme Court of the State. The outlook is good for a series of injunctions, ordered, dissolved, and renewed. Students will shun the scene of controversy, and thus the finest theological library in this country, the improved buildings, and one of the most studious atmospheres in the land, will be almost unused. To the lay mind this seems a clear waste of money, to look at no other aspect of the case, and a plain proof of the folly of a cast-iron endowment like that of Andover. But as long as there is such a pretty theological fight involved, we suppose it will have to be said of the veteran warriors who snuff the fray from afar, so many of whom are concerned in one way and another in this case, as Pascal said of the theological fighters of his day, "Voilà les ecclésiastiques bien à leur aise."

CO-OPERATION IN ENGLAND.

A GREAT congress of the coöperative societies in England—the country in which they have been most successful—has recently been held. Mr. Thomas Hughes ("Tom Brown"), one of the oldest supporters of the movement, indeed, one might almost say its father, was in the chair and delivered a long address on its history and prospects. What he said was extremely important, because coöperation furnishes the one solution of the labor problem yet propounded which is worth the consideration of a rational man. It is the only one which any rational man has been able to describe in detail; the only one which has been tried and has had anything that could be called success, and the only one which promises to strengthen instead of breaking down human character.

The story he had to tell was, in brief, that coöperation in distribution—that is, in the purchase and sale of articles of daily consumption—had been an enormous success, but that coöperation in production had, where it had succeeded, ceased in a great measure to be coöperation in the early and best sense of the word. The distribution stores of the coöperative societies are numerous, and do an enormous and prosperous business, giving the members the full value of every cent they spend. They buy wholesale, and at the lowest rates, and they sell at the same, plus the salaries of clerks and rents of stores. There are no profits and no commissions, and all the coöperators stand on the same footing, and there are millions of them.

From these distributive societies coöperative production, which has always been a delicate plant, has been lately receiving a great stimulus; that is, a considerable number of the distributive societies have begun to ask themselves why they should not manufacture at least a portion of the goods they consume, in order to supply the market on which their hold is so strong and steady. The great difficulty the private manufacturer has to contend with is the difficulty of finding customers. He has to search for them with untiring energy all over the world, and exhaust his ingenuity in trying to keep them. Coöperative manufacturers, however, would have no such difficulty. They have the customers already, and hold them by bonds which no competition can weaken or break. Accordingly, two of the largest distributing societies, known as the "Wholesale Society" of Manchester and of Glasgow, have begun to manufacture boots and shoes on a great scale. The English Wholesale has already two factories, in which they employ 1,000 work-people, and their sales from both reached in 1885 over $1,000,000. The profits are, of course, very great, and they sell to the general public, putting both a manufacturer's and retailer's profit into the price. The result is, of course, greatly to swell the dividends of the Wholesale Societies, and to encourage them to extend their manufacturing operations.

But just here human nature comes in, and threatens the whole coöperative movement with disaster. This development of manufactures is not carried on along the coöperative lines. The work-people in these great shoe factories are not coöperators. They do not share in the profits of the business. They receive simply the market rate of wages. They are on just as bad terms with their coöperative employers as they would be with individual capitalists. Some of them have lately been out on strike, and are working away at the "labor problem" in the same blind way as poor Powderly and his men. If, as Mr. Hughes rightly asks, things go on in this way, if the successful coöperative societies are simply to become corporations controlling large bodies of hired laborers, how is the world going to be any the better for coöperation?

But this is not all, nor the worst. This Wholesale Society which is carrying on this great shoe manufacture is a confederation of small societies. These manufactures are carried on with the surplus funds of these societies left in the hands of the Central Committee, and managed by it. The profits are divided among these societies. No others are let into the confederation now. But outside the confederation there is a large number of small, strug gling societies trying to carry on the same kind of manufactures as the Wholesale Society, but now absolutely unable to stand up against the competition of the Wholesale. In other words, the old process of competition, for which coöperation was expected to be a cure, is showing itself among the co-operators, and they are apparently about to treat us to a renewal of the old spectacle, so familiar in the retail trade, of the strong devouring the weak.

Mr. Hughes, therefore, warns the societies against the introduction of hired labor—that is, labor which has no interest in profits—as likely to prove the destruction of the movement; but whether he can persuade the Wholesale Societies to give up the pleasant business of raking in large gains from hired labor, through devotion to the principle, remains to be seen. The root of the difficulty is something, however, which nobody but workingmen themselves can cure, and it is a difficulty of which we have ample experience in the government of the United States. It consists simply in the reluctance men who work with their hands have in admitting that brain labor is more valuable than manual labor, and ought to be paid more highly. All the successful money-making corporations of the world found out long ago that no price is too high for the organizing and superintending faculty, but the mass of every democratic community is very loth to admit it. The result is, that in every such community the State is apt to be poorly served, while the capitalists are admirably served. The co-operative societies are illustrations of the same thing. Those which happen to get hold of a high order of superintending talent—that is, to secure for the management of their operations men who are skilful in finding out markets and supplying them, and in directing huge bodies of workers, and holding the threads of intricate financial operations—and pay whatever is necessary to keep them, carry everything before them. The societies, on the other hand, which cannot bear to pay high salaries to anybody who has not to work on the bench or at the loom, and can keep his shirt and his hands clean all day, go inevitably to the wall when they attempt to enter the field of competition. That mind must rule is, in fact, as plain in coöperation as in any other field of human endeavor. Even if the whole world were caged in a phalanstery, there would have to be an organizing genius at the head of it, to prevent a free fight every morning for the victuals of the day, and he would be certain to secure the tid-bits at every meal for himself.

THE VICTORIAN JUBILEE.

THE excitement in London over the Queen's jubilee is, of course, due in great part to the powerful hold she has maintained on the English imagination ever since she ascended the throne as a young and inexperienced girl. The accession of such a person to one of the greatest of human dignities was, in itself, enough to rouse the deepest interest and enthusiasm among the people over whom she was to reign. These feelings were intensified, as time went on, by the spectacle of orderly and virtuous family life which she presented to the nation. George III. had fascinated the English people in the same way, in spite of his political follies and misfortunes. He was a model husband and father, who was happy in dining off a boiled leg of mutton with his wife and children. The British people were never tired of admiring him. George IV. outraged by his walk and conversation all the sentiments towards the throne which his father had fostered. William IV., who was a bluff and foul-mouthed sailor, did nothing in his short reign to mend matters.

Queen Victoria, therefore, when she married happily, seemed to bring back the halcyon days of the monarchy. There has been hardly a poet, novelist, preacher, lecturer, or statesman of her time who has not drawn shouts of applause from audiences of every kind and degree by the mention of her domestic virtues, of the purity and simplicity as well as of the dignity and stateliness of her home. And these excellences, of course, won for her the devotion of a portion of the population which, under kings, took little interest either in the personnel or the policy of the Government, but whose support, when the sentiment of loyalty has to be cultivated, is far more valuable than that of the men—we mean the women. It is safe to say that every Englishman to-day under fifty literally drank in admiration for Queen Victoria with his mother's milk, and was taught in his nursery to look on her as one of the best of created beings. No sovereign in history has probably ever been so thoroughly popular in the simplest and best sense of that word. Even English Republicans hardly venture to think of a republic as desirable as long as such monarchs as she can be found.

The political importance of all these excel-lences has been increased by the fact that Victoria, when she ascended the throne, had to face the rising tide of democracy, or, in other words, to meet the entrance into the political arena of the great industrious, frugal, money-making, God-fearing middle class, which, after the overthrow of the Commonwealth, seemed to disappear from the English Government. It had triumphed over the landed gentry in the passage of the Reform Bill five years before the accession of the Queen, and was full of a certain kind of austere wrath against aristocratic folly and corruption. If it had been met at this juncture by a Tory male sovereign of dissolute manners, there is no telling in what way the great change in the British Constitution which the Reform Bill initiated, would have ended. Certainly the transition from oligarchical to popular government would not have been, as it has been, both easy and peaceful. Nor, had the public mind been absorbed in acrimonious party politics, would the nation have entered on that astonishing run of material progress which has been the great glory and wonder of the Victorian era. When the Queen ascended the throne, there were few railroads in the United Kingdom and but a few small steamboats. The cotton and iron industries were in their infancy. The colonies were thinly peopled, poor and discontented. The working classes were hungry, riotous, and disaffected. Nearly all the large fortunes were found among the landed gentry. Foreign trade was kept down to the lowest possible point by the protective tariff and the Navigation Acts. The Indian Empire was the property of a trading corporation, and was managed as such. The Jubilee literature of the day is full of the wondrous material changes for the better which Victoria has witnessed, and certainly her witnessing them is not an accident. She can honestly say that not only has she seen them, but she has been herself a large part of them. Had there been less grace, wisdom, and understanding in her life, assuredly the stream of English progress during the past fifty years would have been neither so deep nor wide nor free. She has been closely identified, in spite of the shadowy nature of her power, with nearly everything of which Englishmen are to-day most proud in the condition of the country.

We presume, however, there will not be one thinking man among the millions in all parts of the globe who will to-morrow share in the congratulations over the happy close of half a century of her rule, who will not find the cup of rejoicing more or less embittered by the reflection that Ireland, the possession of which all Englishmen pronounce essential to the unity of the Empire, is, after eighty years of English government, more completely alienated from it than ever before, and that not a single representative of the Irish people will take part in the Jubilee festival; that the condition of the Irish population is still wretched, and the population diminishing, and that this immense failure or misfortune has to be excused or explained by the old mediæval and thoroughly un-English doctrine of the total and peculiar depravity of the Irish people. The Irish question, in fact, recalls, and as long as it exists will continue to recall, the one great mistake of Victoria's reign—her persistent failure or refusal, and the failure or refusal of every member of her family, to bestow on the Irish any of those marks of favor, sympathy, or good-will, partly royal, partly feminine, by which she has so won the hearts of Englishmen and Scotchmen. The family has, from the beginning of her reign, treated as a distant and disagreeable province a portion of the Empire lying within twelve hours of London, which has supplied during all that period fully a third of the army and navy, some of the best generals and ablest administrators. In no part of the Empire, probably, would the trifles light as air which give monarchy its charm, or make it tolerable, have produced so much effect as in Ireland. The refusal to use them is largely responsible for the terrible fact, of which Englishmen by the end of the century will feel thoroughly ashamed, that the House of Commons broke up to go to the Jubilee ceremonial with shouts of rejoicing over the passage of an Irish coercion bill against which five sixths of the Irish representatives vainly protested.

THE BODYKE EVICTIONS.

DUBLIN, June 11.

UNTIL Parliament reassembled, the attention of the country was riveted on the evictions on Col. O'Callaghan's estate at Bodyke, in the County of Clare. Long threatened, they were interrupted by the illness of one sheriff and the scalding of another. Thirty-five tenants altogether were to be dealt with. Hitherto the Sheriff, assisted by some 300 police and military, has not been able to average more than three evictions a day, so that the proceedings are likely to continue some time longer. Such work would have been more summary ten or twenty years ago. It is one of the difficulties of the extreme landlord party, and even of a Conservative Government such as the present, in Ireland nowadays, that, talk as they may, they know they must carry out their policy with a minimum of violence. It is somewhat grotesque—the spectacle of an unarmed peasant dragged out of his cottage with his wife and family, and having all his little belongings carried forth by men under such military protection; but this arrangement is more merciful than attempting the same task with a smaller body of men, in the presence of whom the temper of the people would certainly get the better of their judgment, and bad work would ensue. In the same way much of what appears harsh and rough in the treatment of the crowds upon these occasions is, from the point of view of the executive upon whom a certain duty is thrown, excusable or necessary.

In a struggle such as the present in Ireland one does not gain much clearer vision or strengthen judgment much by seeing things for himself. Indeed, to some minds—those of a photographic turn—the experiment may be somewhat misleading. These questions ought to be considered broadly in the light of history and wide human experience. Too often they are urged upon the public mainly by arguments based upon minor facts and isolated cases, with conclusions which a scrupulous observer frequently finds belied by the evidence of his senses; and the position of such a one is very difficult if he take any public part in an agitation where the worst is said, and every unfair advantage taken, on both sides. It is strange that it should be so often forgotten by the masses that one may be their strenuous and unbending advocate without being able to see that everything they do is right, and that everything opponents do is wrong and from the worst of motives. Are we never to be allowed to correct the mistakes and exaggerations of those who stand upon our own platform? The anti-slavery agitation, as carried on by the abolitionists, is the only agitation, perhaps, in which such liberty was accorded, and, perhaps, we cannot reasonably expect it here. None the less, the absence of complete frankness tends to alienate or paralyze the efforts of many whose aim is one with that of the party whose exaggerations and misrepresentations, positive and negative, they cannot approve.

Five hours by rail to Birdhill, and a couple of hours' car drive, took me to Bodyke. The route along the shores of Lough Derg was very beautiful—leading, at first, under avenues of fine trees (beside Kincora, where Brian Boru once held his court), and then between hedges of hawthorn and furze, and presenting views over the lake with its islands and picturesque headlands. The attitude of agreement with or suspicion of those whom the unknown traveller meets in Ireland is exceedingly painful, and must do much to make the thoughtless suppose there is no basis of strong nationalist feeling among the masses of the people. When travelling on the Continent, I have felt partly reconciled to the imperfection of my knowledge of languages by the conviction that what we learn by conversation with the populace on any broad question is really of little value. Much more is this the case in Ireland, where cunning, concealment, and deception were so long almost the only weapons left the people. The traveller here must ascend pretty high in the social scale before he can get at real opinion; and even then he must generally be out of earshot of a third party who might differ from the man addressed. "Is there any Irish spoken about here?" I asked of the lad that drove me to Killaloe. "Well, now, there is not." "Is there none at all?" "Well, now, there is some." Of course he thought I had some questionable object in making these inquiries. After we had driven some miles, my next driver, an elderly man, anxious, no doubt, to know how he should shape answers to my questions, asked: "Well, now, sir, can you tell me who this Davitt is?"

Much of the land about Bodyke looks capable of high cultivation, and of supporting a considerable population in comfort. It is picturesque, interspersed with little woods and lakes, and rolls up from the bogs which margin the Graney River to the desolate summits of Slieve Bernagh. Out of these bogs and up those mountain sides the inhabitants have, by their own unaided exertions, carved estates for their landlord. I found it impossible within the time at my disposal to gain the exact information I desired. If the leaders of the people in such cases spent a few days making up reliable returns of the successive rises of rents to which the people have been subjected, of the length of time they have occupied their holdings, of how the accounts have stood between them and their landlord upon the whole for the past thirty years, they would do far more to attract outside public opinion than by any amount of oratory. In the case of forty-nine of these Bodyke tenants, so far as I could ascertain, the Government valuation of their holdings was £630; the rent in 1850 amounted to £595; when the present agitation broke out, these had been "racked-up," on the tenants' own improvements and the supposed rise in the value of land, to £1,224, which was reduced by the land court to £808. These were some of the earlier cases brought into court, when the reductions made were much less than those made at present, and the fall in the value of agricultural produce has been so great that in many cases it would have been as easy to pay the rack rents of ten years ago as the court rents of to-day. By more than anything else that has been said or written on the tenants' side has my judgment been affected by the report of the interview between the representative of the Pall Mall Gazette with Col. O'Callaghan, the owner of the property, and by a conversation I had with a person in an official position on the Government side, who has thoroughly investigated the facts, and who told me that he believed the people had made an honest though ineffectual effort to meet their engagements. If this be true, as I consider it to be, the evictions are being carried out only in a spirit of spite against the tenants, or as an example, at the instance of the body of landlords. As a cattle run, or sheep walk, under the charge of highly paid "emergency-men," the estate could scarcely pay half the lowest rent that would be gladly paid by the associated tenants.

The particulars of the evictions have been so fully given in the papers from day to day that I need not describe them. It was harassing and dispiriting work, tramping round witnessing such scenes—the confusion of right and wrong, the absence of all that indicates a well ordered state—the sad results of generations of studied neglect, of the preference of one of the greatest empires the world has ever seen to continue this policy and drive out thousands of its population, rather than resolutely face and finally settle at any cost this Irish land question. It is impossible not to sympathize with the people in thus desperately clinging to their homes. Three centuries of British rule have not eradicated from their minds the conceptions of the Brehon laws under which they had lived from time immemorial—that they have a joint ownership in the land with the chief or landlord. We and our fathers should have been subjected to their experiences before we could safely judge them. Still less does one feel inclined to give advice which one would not be prepared to back up in one's own person, and the consequences of which one would not have to bear.

Mr. Davitt's speech on the 2d was deplorable. The enlightened public opinion of the United Kingdom would justify the Bodyke tenants in clinging to their homes and going very far beyond the passive resistance of Count Tolstoi; but a theoretical retraction of all Mr. Davitt had ever said against outrage, with threats of ultimate vengeance on England (which he himself would be the last to feel or to think of), shows how entirely he is unfitted to be the responsible leader in a great movement. At the same time, the entire guilelessness of the man was apparent; for all his private influence at Bodyke, so far as I could judge, was to prevent the people resorting to desperate extremities. One more cunning and less disinterested might, on the contrary, openly denounce and secretly abet outrage.

Nothing could be more dignified than the speech with which Mr. Harrington, at the next meeting of the League, endeavored to counteract Mr. Davitt's utterances; or more apposite than the extract he read from a late speech of Mr. Parnell's:

> "I would still urge the Irish to submit to any oppression, to any injustice, rather than to retaliate. . . . There may be some suffering to endure. There may be some tyranny—perhaps much tyranny—inflicted upon us: petty tyrants are always the most merciless. But it will be as nothing compared with what our people have gone through in the past. A little patience, a few years of waiting, and these clouds will be cleared away."

Mr. Parnell and his lieutenants are different men from what they were—from what perhaps it was necessary they should have been—a few years ago. They can speak, they can act, they can engage, as no other party could ever speak, act, or engage, for Ireland. Mr. Parnell's ill-health is the greatest danger in the present situation of affairs, a greater danger than Mr. Gladstone's advanced age. If Mr. Parnell were removed—if the Times and the Spectator could so act upon English opinion, so prolong the contest, as to disintegrate the party—we should be face to face with another miserable cycle of repression, hopelessness, and spasmodic outrage, during which the principles advocated by Dr. McGlynn would have ample time to work.

What I saw during my short tour in the west confirms me in the opinion expressed in my last communication, written after a longer journey in the south—that at no period were the Irish people, upon the whole, better off than they are at present. But this, as I before said, is no criterion of the real condition or possibilities of the country at large. I cannot better illustrate Ireland's position among other nations in this year of supposed jubilee than by stating some facts mainly brought to my notice by the acumen of a friend. Our population, which in 1881 was 5,175,000, is now considerably under 5,000,000. It decreased 8,000 with the first three months of this year. Ireland has now fewer inhabitants than it had at the time of the Union in 1800. The birth-rate is the lowest in Europe. In twenty-one towns, including Dublin, and in eight counties, the deaths within the quarter exceeded the births, and this during a period when the Registrar-General pronounces the health of the people to be on the whole good, and the death-rate below the average. Poland has increased in less than twenty years from 5,500,000 to over 7,000,000. Even Switzerland, half mountain and forest, and with no city as large as Cork, has now a larger population per square mile than Ireland. The country is perfectly well able to support in comfort a larger population than it now contains, and there is no other country in Europe which is not increasing in population more or less rapidly. BOISSIER'S MME. DE SÉVIGNÉ.

PARIS, June 1, 1887.

THE edition of the 'Grands Écrivains de la France,' published by the house of Hachette under the direction of Ad. Regnier, may be said to be a great literary monument. It seems hardly possible to add anything to these editions, which reproduce the original text, which give all the variantes of the successive editions, which are accompanied by the most exhaustive notes and by a perpetual commentary. The firm may be justly proud of having attached its name to these definitive editions of our great classics; but these editions cannot be bought by everybody, they are only made for public libraries and the libraries of wealthy bibliophiles. Some of them have cost so much that it will take years before the Hachettes can repay themselves for their first expenses, before making any profit; it may be said, even, that some of them will never yield any profit.

Our great booksellers have now undertaken a new series of very cheap essays on the 'Grands Écrivains de la France.' This collection of biographical studies will have much interest, as the text will be written by very competent writers, who will have all the benefit of the long and deep researches made for the great edition of the 'Grands Écrivains.' A few names will give an idea of this new collection. Two volumes have already appeared: 'Victor Cousin,' by Jules Simon, and 'Madame de Sévigné,' by Gaston Boissier, of the French Academy. M. Caro will soon give us 'George Sand,' M. Brunetière, the critic of the Revue des Deux Mondes, promises studies on 'Voltaire' and 'Boileau'; M. Taine will attempt to give us 'Sainte-Beuve.' I do not give the whole list of the works in preparation; these few names will suffice.

I confess to have opened with much curiosity the volume by M. Gaston Boissier on Mme. de Sévigné. M. Boissier may be said to be now one of our best Latinists: his studies on Italy, on Roman literature and Roman history, are very well known. But he has not often tried his hand on subjects which touch more directly our own literature. Was it possible to write something new on Mme. de Sévigné, after the Memoir by Walckenaer, after the long notice, which is a volume in itself, placed by M. Mesnard at the head of the edition of the 'Letters' in the 'Grands Ecrivains de la France'? M. Boissier says modestly that he has not had the ambition to write anything new. "After having read over the letters of Mme. de Sévigné, I will simply say what impression they have made on my mind, without asking myself if I repeat what others have said before me: this is the only method which I shall follow in this book." M. Bossier takes in turn the woman, the writer, the work—a somewhat artificial division. Speaking of the woman, he asks himself first, "Was she pretty?" The best picture of Mme. de Sévigné is a pastel by Nanteuil, which belongs to my friend, the Comte de L'Aubespin. As a pastel it is truly admirable, and I am not surprised that these pastels of Nanteuil, and those of the eighteenth century, have inspired some of our modern painters with a desire to revive a form of painting which had been almost forgotten during the first seventy years of the nineteenth century. Nanteuil's pastel has only one defect: it represents the amiable Marchioness when she was no longer young; she is a little too fat, her face is round. I find her pretty, nevertheless—charming; but then I am a posthumous adorer of Mme. de Sévigné. M. Boissier, who is not an enthusiast, says: "It is not quite a pretty woman; one cannot help being surprised, on looking at her, that she had so many admirers." It is quite clear that the intelligence and grace of the woman added much expression to her face; it is true that she had not the most regular features. Arnauld writes in his memoirs: "It seems to me that I still see her as she appeared to me the first time I saw her coming out of her open carriage, between her son and her daughter; all three reminded me of Latona between the young Apollo and the young Diana—such was the beauty and brilliancy of the mother and children." It was only when the first surprise had passed that people noticed "that the eyes were a little small and not quite of the same color, that the eyelids were bigarrées (spotted), that the nose was a little square at the end." These slight defects made Mme. de la Fayette say: "When people hear you they no longer see that something is wanting in the regularity of your features, and they admit in you the most finished beauty in the world." Bussy, her cousin, tells us of her admirable blonde hair, so thick, so supple and brilliant; and the curls she wore are still called the "coiffure à la Sévigné." Bussy also speaks of her complexion, which had a brilliancy and a freshness "which are only seen at the dawn of day on the finest roses of spring."

Mme. de Sévigné was educated by her good uncle, the Abbé de Coulanges. This "bien Bon," as she always called him, was a very original type. He did not often say his mass, and in his will he accuses himself of having "dishonored and profaned the sanctity of his condition by a life too much withdrawn from the objects to which it ought to have been absolutely consecrated." He was pious, he was a believer, he led a most regular life; but there was nothing of the priest in him. He was a born business man, an auditor of accounts. His greatest pleasure was bookkeeping. "When," said Mme. de Sévigné, "the rule of two and two make four is wounded, the good Abbé is beside himself." He kept Mme. de Sévigné's affairs in order, he saw the lawyers, he made the leases, he was her factotum.

Mlle. de Chantal, having lost her mother, was educated with more freedom than was usual at the time, nor was the Abbé de Coulanges a very strict tutor. She learned much of life before she was married, though she was only eighteen when she married the handsome Marquis de Sévigné. She followed him to his Château des Rochers in Brittany, but Sévigné did not long remain there. His wife had brought him a large fortune (530,000 livres, equivalent to 2,000,000 francs in our time), and he began to spend it in the worst company; he kept mistresses, he played at cards, he was proud of being compared to the grand prieur de Malte, Hugues de Rabutin, whom he called "my uncle the pirate." Mme. de Sévigné would probably have been completely ruined if her husband had not had the folly to fight a duel for some new mistress and been killed.

She was a widow at the age of twenty-six, and it may be noticed that in her long correspondence there is not even an allusion to the wicked man who had had her first love. Her first love was also her only love. Charming, admired as she was, when she returned to the world she never again lost her heart, never renounced her precious liberty. She soon had a whole court; she received the homages of Conti, a Prince of the blood, of the famous Fouquet, the Superintendent of Finances, of the Duc de Rohan, one of the greatest names in France, of the Marquis de Tonquedec, of the Comte du Lude. Bussy, who respected nothing, tried for a moment to seduce his cousin. She liked him for the great brilliancy of his intellect and for the pleasure of receiving his letters, but she did not like him otherwise, and Bussy made a wicked portrait of her in his famous gallery of French ladies. "She has," he says, "a cold temperament, at least if we are to believe her defunct husband." I am sorry to say that M. Boissier admits this brutal explanation of Mme. de Sévigné's virtue, a virtue which even the lying and evil-tongued Tallemant des Réaux could not calumniate. And why does he admit it? Because Mme. de Sévigné was not prudish, because she lived in a society which was far from rigorous, because she liked admiration, and did not detest "le mot gaulois" and spicy stories. He adds that she was not very devout. "How is it," he asks, "that a pretty woman who played so willingly with danger did not succumb in the end?" She has herself given the reason of her continuous widowhood: she was preserved from any other love by the love of her children. "I perceive every day," she says in a letter, "that the big fishes eat the little ones." Her children were her big fishes.

Her heart, we know, was not cold; not only was she passionately found of her children, there never was a better or more faithful friend. She had a great stock of indulgence, and though her sense of humor was great, she never speaks of her friends with any degree of harshness. She likes to say the "bien Bon," the "bonne Troche," the "bon d'Hacqueville," the "bonne Marbœuf," the "bonne Tarente." She was good, and to her it might have been said:

"Vous donnez volontiers vos qualités aux autres."

She had much natural gayety, and knew how to amuse the terrible Retz, the gloomy La Rochefoucauld, the wise Mme. de la Fayette. Her friendship with Mme. de la Fayette lasted more than forty years. This lady was a widow at an early age, and had formed with La Rochefoucauld one of those liaisons which might be called the marriages of friendship. Among the friends of Mme. de Sévigné, we must of course name the Coulanges, a singular couple, very different from the preceding—light, free as air, always in motion. Mme. de Sévigné could please the most different people, and make herself adored by all.

There is not much to be said about Mme. de Grignan; she has been judged somewhat severely. Bussy said of her: "This lady has wit, but of the bitter sort; she is insupportably vain; she will make herself as many enemies as her mother has made friends and admirers." Mme. de Sévigné's letters do not make us love her daughter as much as she loved her; she would be sorry to know the impression which she involuntarily produced. M. Mesnard has well analyzed Mme. de Grignan's character in his introduction to the great edition of the 'Letters.' She was at the same time timid and proud; it is impossible not to see that she was a little selfish. She was a little fatigued by the exuberance of her mother's life, and such words as these, "La grande amitié n'est jamais tranquille," which Mme. de Sévigné writes to her, lead us to think that sometimes, when they were together, there were difficult moments. They both loved each other, but, as Pascal said, "il faut de l'adresse dans l'amour." Every week Mme. de Grignan wrote two long letters to her mother, full of details, and M. Boissier is probably right when he says that, had they been preserved, he is tempted to believe that we should have a better idea of Mme. de Grignan. "Those who destroyed them rendered her a bad service." He is inclined to think that she was less selfish, less indifferent, than is generally supposed; she had not the good spirits of her mother, and, on the contrary, was in the category of those who take things hard. She had a philosophical, almost an heretical, mind; she admired and understood the philosophy of Descartes. It is perhaps going a little far to compare her, as M. Boissier does, to our modern pessimists.

Among the most interesting pages which I have found in M. Boissier's work is a description of the Château de Grignan.

"It is easy," he says, "when one visits what remains of the castle of Grignan, to form an idea of the expensiveness of life in such sumptuous habitations. Grignan is built on a hill, which rises solitary in the midst of a vast plain. The rock has been cut and surrounded with walls, so as to form an artificial substruction, on which rises the château. Along the steep sides are narrow streets, lined with the houses of a miserable village which had attached itself there, to live quietly under a powerful protection. The approach to the castle was defended by a massive fortification, flanked with two crenelated towers. When you have once passed the gate and entered inside, the aspect changes; the fortress becomes a palace. Unfortunately, this palace is now almost entirely levelled; there remain only a few walls and ruined parts of halls, which nevertheless have a rare character of greatness and elegance. The walls are pierced with windows with delicate columns, in the style of the Renaissance. . . . All round, a terrace allows you to enjoy one of the finest views you can imagine—a rich plain, dotted with villages, with villas, with castles, shut in on every side by high mountains, the Lance, the chain of the Alpines, and the snowy Ventoux on the horizon."

We know that Grignan, lieutenant-general of Provence, had to keep the place of the governor, the Duc de Vendôme; that he was of a very generous disposition, and, in consequence, was always in debt. Mme. de Sévigné's daughter, who was his third wife, was even more extravagant. Mme. de Sévigné was sometimes obliged to scold them, as she could scold, tenderly and amiably.

The history of Mme. de Sévigné's relations with the Jansenists is also an interesting part of this new work. She had, it may be said, a religion of her own. She was fond of Pascal and Nicole. She thought often of death, and had inscribed on the dial, in her garden of the Rochers, "Unam time."

Correspondence.

THE SURPLUS REVENUE AND THE BONDS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I have had for years a pet plan for applying the surplus revenue to the unmatured bonds, and it seems to me that the necessity of doing something, and the unpopularity of every other contrivance, will push the wise men in the Cabinet and Congress right into it.

My proposal is this: Exchange each 4 per cent. or 4½ per cent. bond that the holder is willing to part with, on these terms, for two securities—the first being a bond with the same number of years to run, but bearing a small enough interest to pass at or near par; the other being a coupon sheet or its registered equivalent, for the difference of the interest only. For instance, if I have a 4½ per cent. bond for $1,000, falling due in 1891, I might receive in exchange a 2½ per cent. bond falling due at the same date, and a sheet made up of quarterly coupons of $5, payable every three months. If a 4 per cent. bond, the separate sheet would be comprised of quarterly coupons for $3.75.

These sheets might be useful for many purposes, like the short annuities formerly in vogue in Great Britain. The reduced bonds, ruling at or near par, could always be bought up in open market. The odious measure of buying bonds at a large premium (as was done by the Taylor Administration), or of anticipating heavy interest payments, would thus be avoided.—Respectfully,

L. N. D.

Louisville, Ky., June 12, 1887.

[There is no reason why a 2½ per cent. bond should not advance to a high premium if it is known that the Government is a forced purchaser. All the rules which apply to a 4 per cent. bond in such a case would apply to a 2½ per cent. bond. The selling price of the former, in the present state of the money market and of the Government credit, is about 130. That of the latter would be about 108. It would be easy to send the former up to 140 by forced Treasury purchases, and it would be quite as easy to send the latter up to 118. The Government saves nothing by converting a part of the interest into a terminable annuity. Any refunding scheme, to command success, must show either a saving of interest or new facilities for redeeming the principal. Splitting the interest into two sets of coupon sheets does not save anything, nor would it make the bondholders more eager to sell.—Ed. Nation.]

A BAD DAY FOR "MACHINE" CANDIDATES.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In your Summary of the Week's News in this week's Nation, you say, in speaking of the recent election in Chicago, that "Grinnell and Clifford, candidates of a citizens' organization, were opposed by Kraus and English, who were candidates of the United Labor party," etc. Now the victory of the citizens' ticket was much more significant than would appear from your statement. Kraus and English were not only candidates of the United Labor party, but were the regular nominees of both the Republican and Democratic "Machines" as well. Surely, the Independent voter or Mugwump has no reason to feel lonesome any longer in Chicago when he studies the results of the last election.

CORRECTIONS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In p. 447 a passage of mine yields, as printed, something widely different from what I mean. Read:

"Again, he delivers himself very uncritically as regards the idiom under consideration. 'Being is prefixed to a Past Participle': this is his definition of it," etc.

Further, in p. 140, read "would be accepted [sic] usage"; and in p. 185, "the adjective rily."

Your obedient servant, F. Hall.

Notes.

Mr. John Bartlett, whose 'Shakspere Phrase-Book' was a light recreation after the latest and perhaps final edition of his 'Familiar Quotations,' has now in hand, for speedy publication, 'A New and Complete Concordance or Verbal Index to the Dramatic Works of Shakspere.' This rival of Mrs. Cowden Clarke's will follow the Globe Edition of Messrs. Clark & Wright; and Mr. Bartlett has endeavored to give the passages "so full and entire that in most cases it will be found unnecessary to consult the plays themselves." Another improvement is, phrases as well as words are entered, so that we have better, for instance, in a great number of combinations with participles or nouns—a feature which, if imitated in our ordinary dictionaries to show common usage, would be a great boon to foreigners learning the language. "Better acquaintance" and "better days" are examples of what we mean.

A Victoria edition of Shakspere in three volumes, uniform with the single-volume Tennyson, and furnished with a new glossary by Mr. Aldis Wright, is shortly to be published by Macmillan & Co. They also announce, as on the eve of appearing, a Clarendon Press edition of Boswell's Johnson, edited by the author of 'Dr. Johnson: His Friends and His Critics,' with the greatest scrupulousness and with much helpful elucidation of obscure points in Johnson's history. Portraits, a concordance of Johnson's sayings, and an elaborate index are promised.

Prof. J. K. Hosmer, who, for his work on 'Young Sir Harry Vane,' has pursued his researches in the British Museum and the London Record Office as well as among the libraries of Boston and St. Louis, sees, we understand, the end of his labors approaching with the end of the present summer.

Benjamin & Bell, New York city, are about to publish with the English sheets the fourth edition of Mr. Alexander Ireland's 'Book-Lover's Enchiridion.' They have in press 'Society Verse by American Writers,' edited by Ernest De Lancey Pierson; 'Shakspere in Fact and in Criticism,' by Appleton Morgan; and 'Mr. Incoul's Misadventure,' a novel by Edgar Saltus.

'The Literary Remains of the late Professor Fleming Jenkin,' edited by Mr. Sidney Colvin, will be published shortly in London by the Longmans, and the biographical sketch by Mr. R. L. Stevenson (which we mentioned recently) will serve as an introduction.

Two books by Mr. Andrew Lang are also announced by the same house. One is 'Johnny Nut and the Golden Goose,' done into English from the French of Charles Deulin, with illustrations by Am. Lynen—apparently a pretty picture-book. The other is the important treatise on folk-lore on which Mr. Lang has been known to be working hard for several years, and in which he sets forth at length and completely his theory of the origin of myths—the anthropological explanation, as he terms it, intended to supersede the philological explanation offered by Max Müller and other upholders of omnipresent sunmyths. Mr. Lang's book will be in two volumes. It will be called 'Myth, Ritual, and Religion.'

In Mr. Freeman's series of "Historic Towns," in which his own 'Exeter,' Mr. Loftie's 'London,' and Mr. Hunt's 'Bristol' have already appeared, Mr. C. W. Boase's 'Oxford' and the Rev. Mr. Edward L. Cutts's 'Colchester' are now ready. Mr. George Saintsbury's 'Manchester: a Short History' is also nearly ready; but, although announced originally as one of this series, it will now appear independently, owing to a disagreement on certain political points between Mr. Freeman and Mr. Saintsbury.

The advertisements of the English publishers assert that Mr. Rider Haggard's 'She' has reached a sale of forty thousand copies in Great Britain. It would be interesting to know how many copies had been sold of the half-dozen rival reprints in the United States.

Zupitza's 'Elene,' edited, by his permission, by Prof. Henry Johnson of Bowdoin College, is the forthcoming addition to Ginn & Co.'s "Library of Anglo-Saxon Poetry."

Nine octavo volumes, forming "a series of systematic works covering the entire field of political science proper and of the allied sciences of public law and economics," are to be issued by the Faculty of Political Science of Columbia College. The titles are: 'History of Political Theories,' by Archibald Alexander; 'Comparative Constitutional Law and Politics,' by John W. Burgess; 'Comparative Constitutional Law of the American Commonwealths,' by Frederick W. Whitridge; 'Historical and Practical Political Economy,' by Richmond M. Smith; 'Historical and Comparative Science of Finance,' by Edwin R. A. Seligman; 'Comparative Administrative Law and Science,' by Frank J. Goodnow; 'International Law,' by Theodore W. Dwight; 'Historical and Comparative Jurisprudence,' by Munroe Smith; 'Literature of Political Science,' by George H. Baker. The first of these volumes will be published in December, 1887. The entire series will probably be completed within the four following years—that is, before the close of the year 1891.

The Ohio Archæological and Historical Society, of Columbus, is fostering the centennial celebration of the Ordinance of 1787 and the founding of the first settlement in Ohio at Marietta in 1788. It has also issued the prospectus of an Ohio Archæological and Historical Quarterly, to be edited by a committee consisting of Profs. G. W. Knight, B. A. Hinsdale, W. H. Venable, G. Frederick Wright, and Dr. I. W. Andrews. The first issue is set down for the present month. Members of the Society will receive this publication free.

Mr. Robert S. Rantoul makes, in the Historical Collections of the Essex Institute, Salem, Mass. (vol. xxiv, Nos. 1-3), a "contribution to the history of the ancient family of Woodbury," to which belonged Levi Woodbury, Jackson's Secretary of the Treasury, afterwards Judge of the Supreme Court. A photograph of Judge Woodbury, after Powers's bust, accompanies the paper. Mr. Geo. B. Blodgette's patient list of the early settlers of Rowley, Mass., prior to 1662 is concluded in the present number of the Collections.

Dr. Emin Pasha contributes to the Scottish Geographical Magazine for June an account of a journey made last year to Lake Albert in his steamer, the Khedive. He first skirted the western shore, and at one point found that an island had been formed within the last five years, showing that "the lake is in this part gradually filling up." Fish are so numerous that "the light green waters of the lake, owing to the refraction of the sunlight on the glittering silvery scales of the fish, assumed an almost bluish-green hue." Crossing to the eastern shore, he landed at Kibiro, where are hot springs from which salt is extracted in large quantities. The region about is sterile in the extreme, even the grass for the native huts and the wood for their fires having to be bought with salt. The process of extraction from the rock and earth about the springs is elaborate, and shows considerable intelligence on the part of the natives, but they are ignorant of the use of salt in curing fish, though they carry dried fish as well as twenty-five-pound packets of salt to great distances to barter for food, clothing, and ammunition. At this village Emin Pasha received letters from Dr. Junker, Nubar Pasha, and the Sultan of Zanzibar, and was also able to send out letters. He makes no reference to his own condition nor to that of his province, but writes simply as an explorer and naturalist. In an appendix, extracts are given from a letter recently received from him, in which he says that, since this paper was written, he has made two more trips to the lake, and has discovered a large river flowing into its southern end.

There is also an account of Bechuanaland by the late Deputy-Commissioner, Mr. John Mackenzie, accompanied by a map. He gives a more encouraging opinion of the capacity of a large part of this territory for sheep raising than most writers. In describing the ruins of ancient stone forts in the gold-bearing regions in the eastern part, he makes the curious remark that the ornamentations of the stones are the same as those on the stone towers of refuge erected by the Persians on the Turcoman frontier. He suggests that they were made by Phœnician miners. A singular native word for the sea is of recent origin. The Bechuanas had no conception of the sea, but some of their people who had travelled came back to them saying, "that they had been as far as Metse-hula, that is, the water which goes out to graze; the water whose tides reminded them of the cattle in their native town going out to graze in the morning and returning in the afternoon." Readers of Lowell's verse will recall the same metaphor in his "Sea-Weed," that doubts not > "the pale shepherdess will keep her tryst,

> And shoreward lead again her foam-fleeced flocks."

The twelfth volume of Reclus's 'Nouvelle Géographie Universelle' (Paris, Hachette), just published, is devoted to a description of the West African islands, Senegambia and the coast as far as the Cameroons, together with the countries adjacent, including the basins of the Niger and Lake Tchad. It is full of descriptions of scenery, the manners, customs, forms of government and religious beliefs of the natives, and gives also short historical accounts of the various settlements. It is strange that while there are many excellent small maps, there is no general map of the region treated. The book would also have been more valuable had the author given a list of the numerous authorities from whom he quotes.

We are in receipt of a pamphlet entitled "The True Source of the Mississippi," by Pearce Giles, who, it will be remembered, was a companion of Capt. Glazier in his expedition of "discovery." The pamphlet contains a rehearsal of the ridiculous claims of Capt. Glazier, a reprint of his absurd map, and about 150 endorsements, the latter occupying about three-fourths of the pamphlet. The claims of Capt. Glazier have been exploded in the most thorough manner by Messrs. Harrower, Baker, Hinman, and others, so that the pamphlet needs no attention in regard to the subject-matter. The endorsements, however, are of interest, as showing the number and the sort of people upon whom Capt. Glazier has succeeded in imposing. Most of them are from private citizens, minor officials, and local newspapers of Minnesota, which are of course easily enough obtained; but in the list one sees a few names which should not be found in such company, such as those of several societies, of map and geography publishers, and of public-school officers. The New Orleans Academy of Science, the Missouri Historical Society of St. Louis, and the Royal Geographical Society of London fell victims, and are now doubtless heartily ashamed of their gullibility. An attempt was made to ensnare the American Geographical Society, but Judge Daly saved the Society that reproach. Twelve publishers of maps, school geographies, etc., in this country and England have apparently accepted Capt. Glazier and his lake, and have thereby demonstrated their ignorance or carelessness. It is safe to predict that the introduction of this error will not promote the sale of the publications of these firms or promote confidence in the works issued by them.

Macmillan & Co. send us a comely one-volume edition of Carlyle's 'Reminiscences,' as edited by Prof. C. E. Norton and already noticed by us.

'Ladhope Leaves; A Spring Garland for 1887' is the pretty name of a very pretty little vellum-clad volume without preface, editor's name, or publisher's imprint; only the name of the printers appears—T. & A. Constable. It is an anthology apparently written chiefly by Scotch men of letters, although it begins with a bit of Mr. Ruskin's prose, "Ashestiel" from Fors Clavigera. In the copy before us, Mr. Ruskin's assertion that from the bridge of Ettrick he "saw the two streams join, and the Tweed for miles down the vale and the Ettrick for miles up among his hills"—has a marginal note in the handwriting of a well-known Scotch poet, "Quite impossible."

To collectors of Jubilee literature we can indicate a little volume, with a quasi-religious title, 'Our Sovereign Lady: A Book for Her People,' by L. E. O'R., of which A. D. F. Randolph & Co. are the American publishers. It closes with a rhapsody on "The Coming Glory," and with "signs of the times" which were overworked in Millerite days.

Five heads of colleges and universities with three literary men of distinction told each, in the Forum, "How I was Educated." Nine persons of all faiths and of no faith made confession of their views on religion anonymously through the same medium. These more or less interesting and edifying disclosures have been grouped and reprinted in one volume by D. Appleton & Co.

The fact that 'Down-East Latch Strings' emanates from the Passenger Department of a New England railroad cannot make it improper to notice a bound volume of which the text is by that agreeable causeur, Mr. Ernest Ingersoll, and which is well supplied with illustrations and with maps of the routes to the most attractive summer resorts in Maine and New Hampshire. If hotel-keepers showed a tithe of the intelligence and enterprise displayed in this compilation, fewer Americans would go abroad for rest and recreation.

A pocket paragraph Greek Testament following Tischendorf's text, and giving in the lower margin the various readings of Westcott and Hort's Cambridge edition, has been skilfully edited by Oscar de Gebhart, and published by Tauchnitz (New York: Westermann). The type is large and clear. A "Recensus locorum Veteris Testamenti in Novo"—passages which are printed in a heavy-faced type—is appended.

The controversy in reference to lending books and manuscripts belonging to the Bodleian Library at Oxford has at length been decided by a vote of the Congregation, 106 to 60, declining to sanction the practice.

Galileo's library has been reconstructed by Prof. Antonio Favaro, with the aid of manuscripts, the astronomer's correspondence and works, and the inventory returned by his immediate descendants and those of Vincenzio Viviani, who acquired the greater part of Galileo's scientific collection. The number of works thus ascertained and classified is 521.

August Boltz reviews, in No. 23 of the Magazin für die Literatur des In- und Auslandes, Stratégis's translation in Greek of Goethe's "Faust," with which he is not altogether satisfied. He also prints an extract from a letter to him written by A. R. Rangabé, Greek Ambassador at Berlin, who complains of ill-health, and considers it a just punishment for his venturing upon a translation of the untranslatable "Faust," of which he says he has completed one-half: "If Goethe's 'Faust' had existed in the time of Hercules, its translation would certainly have been imposed on him by the gods as one of his hardest labors."

The new edition of Victor Hugo's 'Les Misérables,' of which the first part, 'Fantine,' is just published by William R. Jenkins, New York, will be very welcome to readers of French, especially as, for some unaccountable reason, the Paris publishers have withdrawn the 12mo edition from the market. The American reprint is on good paper, in good type, and very reasonable in price. It is to be hoped that the publisher may find this a successful venture, so that he may be encouraged to publish other prose works of the author not accessible in cheap editions, such as 'Quatre-vingt-treize' and 'Histoire d'un Crime.'

Among the late publications of the "Nouvelle Bibliothèque Populaire" (Paris: Gautier; Boston: Schoenhof) may be mentioned 'Les vieux poètes français,' selections from Eustache Deschamps, Christine de Pisan, Charles d'Orléans, Villon, and the poets of the Pléiade. As this series is published under Catholic auspices, we may expect to find in it several detached gems of literature not easily obtainable alone. Such are Mgr. Dupanloup's funeral oration on Gen. Lamoricière, followed by his celebrated letter to Gambetta written in 1871; Bossuet's 'Variations des Églises Protestantes,' a selection of some of the most striking passages of this remarkable work, etc. The "Nouvelle Bibliothèque" now numbers over thirty volumes at ten centimes each.

M. Auguste Garnier, the elder of the brothers Garnier, the well-known publishers of Paris, died on May 24, at the age of seventy-four. In 1833, when only twenty, together with his brother Hippolyte, four years younger than himself, he began the business which has since become an important one, in a shop in the Palais-Royal, in which they remained for forty years, removing only in 1873 to the present establishment, Rue des Saints-Pères, in a building formerly the residence of the military governor of Paris. The publications bearing the imprint of Garnier Frères are numerous. Among the best known are works of Béranger and of Sainte-Beuve, of Voltaire and of Diderot, and the Rabelais and Balzac's 'Contes drolatiques' illustrated by Gustave Doré.

—The announcement of the discovery of a poem by Edgar A. Poe, nearly a thousand lines long and hitherto unguessed, is one to excite interest of a lively kind; yet no less distinguished an origin is claimed for an obscure pamphlet published in Philadelphia in 1847, and now issued under the title 'The Poets and Poetry of America, a Satire by 'Lavante,' reprinted,' etc. (New York: Benjamin & Bell.) The finder of this literary waif prefaces it with a very able and thoroughly informed introduction, in which he seeks to show that Poe wrote the poem and left it unclaimed, and he makes out a strong case. It is not surprising that Poe should publish it anonymously as he did several of his poems, and his not acknowledging it after it had failed is quite consonant with his secretive and proud temperament. In 1847 he was, it has hitherto been supposed, idle, and this work fills up the gap in his activity; he had the money to pay for its cheap publication, derived from his libel suit in February; and it has been pointed out that he advertised, March 20, 1847, 'The Authors of America, in Prose and Verse, by Edgar Allan Poe,' as shortly to appear. This satire is believed to be the "Verse" portion of that work. The internal evidence is also strong. The hatred of Griswold, the contempt of Rufus Dawes, the jealousy of the Northern poets and the partisan Southern touch, the omission of all the "female poets," the theory of poetry expressed and the unbridled egotism and spleen personally exhibited—are leading traits that serve severally to point out Poe as the writer; and there are several minor notes of his style, not excepting redundancy and defects in the rhythm. There is certainly no overstatement in the conclusion advanced, "Either Poe wrote this satire, or somebody else, still unknown, wrote it with Poe's experience, Poe's doctrines, Poe's animus, and in Poe's language." The last thirty-five lines are as surely Poe's as mere internal evidence can make them, the very tone of his voice; but so long as no direct authority can be adduced, the proof must be regarded as incomplete. Independently of its authorship, the satire is by a practised and talented hand, but utterly without the touch of genius. It is, in fact, insignificant as literature, simply a well-written bitter squib. In satiric verse, it would seem, Poe's hand was cramped, and he did not lay about him with the vigor and point he showed in the free field of his prose. If it be granted that this satire is the summary and crowning outcome of his long labors in exposing "puffery" and "quackery," the finished poetic version of his "prose Dunciad"—and we do not see how to deny it—it only affords wholesale justification for Henry James's remark about Poe's "very valueless verses." The contemporary history of the pamphlet could probably be recovered from newspaper files.

—The third volume in Mr. John Bigelow's edition of Franklin's Works (Putnams) takes us into the year 1766, and covers his two visits to England as agent of the Pennsylvania Assembly against the Proprietaries. We have also the memorable examination before the House of Commons in reference to the Stamp Act, in which the Revolution was so clearly foreshadowed in Franklin's answers. Another statesmanlike document is the pamphlet urging British retention of Canada after its conquest. Humane and worth reading now is the "Narrative of the late Massacres, in Lancaster Co., of a number of Indians," etc. There are likewise Remarks on a Ministerial plan for the future management of Indian affairs (1765–66). Interesting are the letters relating Franklin's visit to his father's birthplace and relatives. The philosopher is seen in the correspondence touching the possible connection between volcanic eruptions and the inleaking of the sea upon the fiery core of the earth; the action of oil and water as observed in a glass at sea; the southerly origin of northeast storms on the Atlantic coast; the sound-carrying power of water, as when two stones are clashed below the surface, etc. There are, further, observations upon music. The printer comes out in the humorous letter to the founder Baskerville, narrating a little deception played on a bigoted admirer of Caslon. The classic writer of homely English appears in the letter to David Hume confessing some Americanisms in Franklin's recent pamphlet. "The 'pejorate' and the 'colonize,'" says the offender, "since they are not in common use here [in England], I give up as bad; for certainly in writings intended for persuasion and for general information, one cannot be too clear, and every expression in the least obscure is a fault. The 'unshakeable,' too, though clear, I give up as rather low." But Franklin proceeds to justify necessary neologisms, and envies the Germans their word-building, which would make "uncomeatable" as proper as "inaccessible," and more intelligible.

—Mr. Bigelow's part in editing this volume has been comparatively slight, and he has taken little pains to make its contents obvious by brief synopses in the table of contents. He sometimes foregoes them altogether. We do not know whether the foot-note on Lord Marischal (George Keith) is Mr. Bigelow's or another's; but since the document is a letter to David Hume, it seems odd that Rousseau should receive no mention in connection with the Scotch soldier of fortune here spoken of as "a person of consideration in Neufchâtel." Nor is Keith's friendship with Frederick the Great alluded to. Mr. Bigelow quotes from the Biography of Johann D. Michaelis an account of this theologian's meeting with Franklin and Sir John Pringle at Göttingen in the summer of 1766, during a Continental tour of which the records are very scanty. Franklin is represented as being then no believer in the possibility of secession from the mother country. The student who introduced the travellers—both "Englishmen" to him—contrasted their demeanor with that of Lessing, who visited Göttingen in the same summer. "The Britons, decried for their pride, were very sociable and well-informed. The German, on the contrary, was very haughty and controversial in conversation."

— Miss Isabel F. Hapgood's article, "Count Tolstoi and the Public Censor," in the Atlantic for July, is interesting as a practical example of just how the liberty of the press is restricted in Russia, but much more for the abstract it gives of Tolstoi's experiences as a census-taker in Moscow, and of his feelings and reflections when his peculiar ideas were still in the formative stage. Independently of agreement or disagreement with his conclusions, the criticism on social life which is involved in the autobiographical chapters of his works has a strong attraction for the mind, and nothing that has been given us of his is more genuine, simple, and direct than what is contained in Miss Hapgood's résumé. Agnes Repplier writes a paper full of literary anecdote and light criticism about the decay of sentiment, and takes occasion to contrast the reception the earlier authors of this century met with from the young and old with the mild welcome which the realistic school obtains and favors. She aims her covert arrows with great tact. Mr. H. E. Scudder returns to a favorite subject in his paper, urging the use of the best American literature in the books of the common schools. Mr. Lawton again furnishes an Euripidean study, illustrated by careful and chaste renderings from the 'Alcestis'; and Mr. Crawford begins to unravel the mystery of 'Paul Patoff,' which has been very readable fiction. The number is introduced by a long ode, "Our Country," by Mr. George E. Woodberry, replete with fervent patriotism and hopeful prophecy. One need not lack sympathy with this to enjoy most, as poetry, the closing division of the ode, which has a calm strength and simplicity very gratifying after the high-strung and at times somewhat obscure and inarticulated invocation.

—A translation of one of the most interesting of the religious works of Count Tolstoi, 'Ma Confession,' has just been published for the first time in French (Paris: Albert Savine; Boston: Schoenhof). It is one of those which have never been printed in Russia, but which circulate there in manuscript in large numbers. It seems to have been written in great part in 1879, but there is an added chapter at the end of the translation, a kind of metaphorical résumé of the whole book, with the date of 1882. This translation was made from one of the two editions of the work printed in Geneva, the form in which it has generally reached western readers of Russian. 'Ma Confession' has the charm of French well written, and it is not long enough to repel any one interested in Tolstoi. It is less than half the length of 'Ma Religion,' and adequately represents the religious growth of Tolstoi's life. It has all the straightforward earnestness and power of his best literary work, and it seizes and holds the attention and the sympathies of the reader from the first page to the last. An English translation of the same work, evidently also from the Geneva edition, appeared in 1885 in a volume called 'Christ's Christianity, by Count Leo Tolstoi' (London: Kegan Paul, Trench & Co.), of which it formed the first part, "How I came to believe," not quite a fourth of the whole. The second part, "What I believe," is the much longer work translated into French about the same time, the well-known 'Ma Religion,' which is dated January, 1884. The third part is called "The Spirit of Christ's Teaching (a commentary on the essence of the Gospel)." This seems to be a condensation by Tolstoi himself of part of a larger work, and completes the view of his religious ideas, as far as he wished at that period to express them. The preface of the editor of 'Christ's Christianity' is very simply and seriously written, and the book is addressed to those only "who are more in search of truth than of style." It is impossible to judge from this preface what the editor's religious beliefs may be; but, whether he accepts the views of Tolstoi or not, he is the only one among the many translators and writers about his religious and moral development, that have come under our observation, who receives these views in a sympathetic spirit. This English volume has no editor's name; but in a note at the end of a short preface an address is given, which may be that of the editor himself, to which "any kind of criticism upon the work by any one who is in earnest" may be sent: "H. F. Battersby, Ashburne, Ealing."

—'Que faire?' translated into French a few months ago (Paris: Albert Savine; Boston: Schoenhof), presents another aspect of Count Tolstoi's moral nature. While 'Ma Confession' represents his religious growth and emotions, 'Que faire?' (a still more recent work) represents the awakening to a new activity, and the gradual development of the sense of the duty of one human being towards the mass of suffering humanity around him. It is neither a story nor a personal confession; but, with the instincts of the dramatic poet of his earlier writings, he has thrown around a suitable personality the experiences and mistakes of one sincerely touched by the misery and sin he sees around him, and sincerely desirous of relieving it. The book touches on the deepest questions that occupy the philanthropist and the political economist, and that will continue to occupy them as long as there are rich and poor, upper and lower classes of society.

—Lord Gifford, one of the Scottish Judges, has left behind him one of the most remarkable wills, probably, that were ever penned. He has devised $400,000, in various proportions, to the four Scottish Universities, to be devoted to the foundation of lectureships in natural theology. The last number of Mind contains some extracts from the trust-deed, which we reproduce in part. Of his estate he considers himself bound to employ a certain portion for "the good of his fellow-men," and therefore founds the lectureship for promoting "the study of natural theology in the widest sense of the term; in other words, the knowledge of God, the Infinite, the All, the First and Only Cause, the One and the Sole Substance, the Sole Being, the Sole Reality, and the Sole Existence, the knowledge of His nature and attributes, the knowledge of the relations which men and the whole universe bear to Him, the knowledge of the nature and foundation of ethics or morals, and of all obligations and duties thence arising"; having long "been deeply and firmly convinced that such knowledge is the means of man's highest well-being and the security of his upward progress." "The lecturers appointed shall be subject to no test of any kind, and shall not be required to take any oath or to emit or subscribe any declaration of belief, or to make any promise of any kind; they may be of any denomination whatever, or of no denomination at all (and many earnest and high-minded men prefer to belong to no ecclesiastical denomination); they may be of any religion or way of thinking, or, as is sometimes said, they may be of no religion, or they may be so-called sceptics or agnostics or free-thinkers, provided only that the 'patrons' will use diligence to secure that they be able, reverent men, true thinkers, sincere lovers of and earnest inquirers after truth." "I have intentionally indicated, in describing the subject of the lectures, the general aspect which personally I would expect the lectures to bear, but the lecturers shall be under no restraint whatever in their treatment of their theme; for example, they may freely discuss (and it may be well to do so) all questions about man's conceptions of God or the Infinite; their origin, nature, and truth; whether he can have any such conceptions; whether God is under any or what limitations; and so on—as I am persuaded that nothing but good can result from free discussion."

'SARACINESCA' is the introductory volume of a series in which Mr. Crawford intends to disclose the history of a noble and powerful Roman family during the last quarter of a century. It is more interesting for what it promises—an inside view of the most important political episodes in modern Italian history—than for what it is. The substance of the prologue is not sufficient to justify its length, which may scarcely be excused on the plea that it is necessary thoroughly to familiarize the reader with the scene and characters of the contemplated drama. The story, the love of a man for a married woman, is the common property of novelists, and the elaboration of certain incidents inevitably consequent on that situation is not necessary to intensify any local color. When Mr. Crawford dwells on the machinations of his villain, Ugo del Ferice, he is not advancing his avowed purpose, but, on the contrary, seems to be falling back on conventional and trashy methods for making scenes and excitement. In an author, however, who made his reputation on such extravagances as 'Dr. Claudius' and 'Mr. Isaacs,' the wonder is not that he should occasionally be showy and unnatural, but that he should ever successfully moderate those propensities. In the greater part of 'Saracinesca' Mr. Crawford has not only moderated but overcome them. He has resisted innumerable and terrible temptations. One is the relation between Corona d'Astrardente and Giovanni Saracinesca while the Duc d'Astrardente is alive. He could easily have made that appear sensual, if not base; he has really made it appear refined and delicate, and impressed the reader with the woman's purity and the man's nobility.

Another and perhaps greater temptation is to exaggerate the external and material magnificence of his people whose social rank is exalted. A novelist can hardly set himself a more difficult task than faithfully to depict the daily life and thought of a class limited, exclusive, and privileged, concerning whom the credulity of the general public is large. If he escape reckless extravagance, he may fall into coldness and colorlessness. To avoid either, he must have honest purpose, accurate knowledge of his field, cool judgment, and a nice sense of literary proportion and effect. Mr. Crawford has found the middle way and kept to it. He has carefully guarded against the sins of Ouida and minor high-pressure romancists, and yet he has given us Princes and Powers thoroughly alive and human. The ease and luxury of their surroundings have no spectacular gorgeousness; the courteous formality and dignified reserve of their daily intercourse are not travesties of high-breeding and burlesques of the English language. The Duke d'Astrardente is a poor, miserable, painted image, but he is always a gentleman and never an ape. The old Saracinesca, whose virility is in strong contrast to D'Astrardente's effeminacy, is irascible and violent, but he is a man and a Prince, not a ruffian decorated with a title. These two old men, with the younger Saracinesca, admirably illustrate a point to which the author specifically attracts attention—that is, the marked and pleasing strain of simplicity underlying the cosmopolitanism of the Roman nobility as a class. The distinct characterization of this group, and the careful ranging of all his forces, certainly indicate Mr. Crawford's ability to carry out a fine plan largely conceived. And, further, the book suggests that the life which unites intelligence and refinement with strength and passion is not for ever to be excluded from realistic literature.

If the history of a Roman family should prove to have been designed on too extended a scale for satisfactory treatment in fiction, the disappointment inflicted will be exactly unlike that we feel after reading Mr. Bunner's 'Story of a New York House.' The outline is perfectly clear, but the outline of a story stretching over eighty years requires a good many pages. Here it has demanded so many of the whole number that few are left for the filling in, and the feeling is almost crowded out. Fortunately, Mr. Bunner has qualities of gentleness and humor which manage to leave their impress even on an outline. Of course he only assumes to tell the story of a house, but literally the story of a house may be told in a line—at least until the walls which have always had ears shall develop tongues: the house is built; it stands so many years; it falls either by force or natural process of disintegration and ruin. What further may be said about a house, without superfluity, concerns the people who go in and out its doors, who live and die within its walls. It is really the story of three generations of Dolphs who lived in a house built when New Yorkers said St. John's Park was out of town, that Mr. Bunner tells, and tells so incompletely that we can form to ourselves no satisfactory picture of any one generation, scarcely of any individual. The Dolphs and their friends are interesting shadows, attractive phantoms, not solid figures to be sympathized with, thought over, and talked about. The occasional sharp strokes of characterization and pithy description go a long way; but with hints and nods and winks, however expressive, we cannot make connections smoothly over great gaps of years and sad vicissitudes. To have put so much in so little, without awkward haste, is, technically, to have done a clever thing; but it is not an artistic achievement. Moreover, Mr. Bunner, in thus cramping and limiting himself, has missed the chief purpose of semi-historic fiction, which is so to vivify the past that the sense of remoteness in time is, for the reader, practically annihilated.

Mr. Black's 'Sabina Zembra' prompts two questions irresistibly. Why did that wise virgin, Sabina, being married to Mr. Foster, straightway become a fool? Why did that frank, genial, and healthy Mr. Foster, being married to Sabina, straightway become a scamp and start at headlong speed down the path of vice to the pits of degradation and timely death? Generalization on the after-effects of matrimony fails to answer the questions, and Mr. Black offers no explanation. The only way to account for such convulsions of character is by supposing that Mr. Black began to write about the people without any definite idea, and, long before he was done with them, forgot their original personality. Indeed, throughout the novel there is abundant evidence of defective plan, or of no plan at all. The work is perfunctory, slovenly, with considerable posing and clap trap, and much laborious description of insignificant things. The author gushes very liberally over Sabina's lover and second husband, Mr. Lindsay, and makes a great point of that gentleman's devotion to a rock-crystal cup which Sabina's lips once had touched. Mr. Lindsay is certainly an excellent young man, who, if he did not owe his existence to a fellow-man, would be scoffed at as a woman's hero.

Mr. Lindsay is quite as irreproachable as Carlo Donati, the principal figure in Edna Lyall's 'Knight-Errant,' and has not the Italian's urgent motive for ingenious self-sacrifice. The men are equally beautiful in person and pure of heart, equally but not similarly dowered with genius—Lindsay being a great painter and Donati a marvellous singer. In novels sturdy virtues are seldom ascribed to individuals preëminent in art, and, if the class has been unjustly maligned, the public ought to study Lindsay and Donati and correct its long-standing prejudice. Donati's renunciations of personal desires and ambitions are for the sake of a sister, not able to take care of herself, and not very well worth taking care of. He bears great troubles and petty annoyances with the patience of a saint, and his admirable picturesqueness throughout proves that nature surely meant him for an Italian opera singer. Some years ago, a good many now, it is said that people shed tears of sympathy as Italian operatic heroes proclaimed their anguish behind the footlights. In those days the same people could probably have absorbed themselves in the woes of Donati: but he has come too late, and must, we fear, appeal to an unresponsive audience.

In 'Without Blemish' Mrs. Walworth discusses the social problem in which the negro is the principal factor. It is a pity that any one addicted to writing on subjects so serious as those which involve the welfare of communities, and even of races, should adopt the emotional view and method rather than the rational. It at once excites suspicion of the justice of his observations and distrust of the wisdom of his conclusions. Mrs. Walworth does not discourse about the negro of the South so hysterically as she did about the Mormon of Utah in the 'Bar Sinister,' but her excitability is still more evident than her critical judgment. She is unfortunate, too, in selecting, as the medium for illustrating her economic ideas, a melodramatic plot, one in the last degree sensational and improbable. It is impossible to combine a sermon and a burlesque without exciting contempt for the sermon, or leaving people coldly indifferent to it. By subjecting to a series of improbable events a number of people whose conversational methods are stagey and ridiculous, the author has nearly nullified what good her sermon might do. Still, one may glean from it some sensible and earnest arguments urging patient education of the negro by those who once were his masters, and who are now largely dependent on him for their existence. The arguments are not novel, but they have more substantial claims on our consideration than have many brilliant experimental theories.

The only interest in the Icelandic love-story 'Sigrid' is its curiously primitive conception and construction. The simplicity of the characters is harsh and crude, singularly unattractive, and the slight intrigue seems to be imitated from poor foreign models, imperfectly understood. In the preface attention is claimed for the translation as a "poetical work." On every page there is evidence that the translator is unfamiliar with English idiom, and, having read the story, it is almost certain that he has unconsciously misused the word "poetical." If he has used the word advisedly, and if, as the preface goes on to say, 'Sigrid' is a "perspicuous and comprehensive word-painting of the Icelandic people," then the Icelandic people are about as poetical as a peddler of lightning-rods or an Israelite dealer in old clothes.

It is said that thirteen separate American issues of Mr. Haggard's 'She' are now in circulation. The fact must naturally be gratifying to the author, but it is not distinctly creditable to the literary taste and cultivation of Americans. Gross impossibilities without number, pages of platitudinous reflection, a smattering of learning, scenes that are revolting, scenes that are indecent—all that is 'She,' and that is all 'She' is. Nevertheless, thousands of people have read 'She,' and probably thousands more are waiting for a chance. In the face of this spectacle, the only criticism of any value would have to take the shape of an essay on the advantages of not knowing how to read.

The typical American girl abroad, particularly as she presents herself to the eyes of the English, has been used as a subject for novels of late years ad nauseam. A book devoted wholly to her glorification or to her detraction, or (as is the case with the anonymous volume from an English pen, entitled 'Miss Bayle's Romance') to a would-be impartial survey of the topic, must needs be of very unusual excellence in order to attract more than passing attention at the present day. This novel certainly cannot lay any claim to being reckoned in that category, and the author's manifest cleverness would have produced more effect in any other line than this. In spite of the fact that he hints at a sort of approval of his crude heroine, by wedding her to the heir to an English dukedom, the reader cannot help feeling that she, as well as her father and mother, is being sketched with the same intention which inspires an artist to furnish the typical Yankee with a star-spangled suit, lank hair, and a white fur hat. Under such conditions, the personages in a novel can hardly fail to degenerate into mere conventional puppets. The wooden effect in this particular case is heightened by a singular stiffness and lack of flexibility in style, which makes the descriptions of action and travel read like cut-and-dried extracts from a guide-book, and betrays the fact that the writer is a novice in this field of work. The really clever passages are those which give succinct accounts of American business methods, though the sensational strength of the volume lies in the introduction of well-known personages, undisguised or very thinly veiled. But a marionette show cannot be very interesting or exciting under any circumstances, and the author's lack of practice in pulling his wires spoils the reader's comfort and pleasure in a work which is neither absolutely insignificant nor absolutely good, so singularly are cleverness, clumsiness, and the commonplace intermingled. The noteworthy point is the author's attempt to vindicate the reputation of croupiers at the gambling tables in the south of France. Unfortunately for his purpose, he has not the courage to carry out his first intention, but dodges the issue; also, unfortunately, his reluctance on that point was accentuated shortly after the publication of his book by a glaring case of dishonesty at the very spot which he defends.

The popularity attained by Dr. Julius Stinde's amusing volumes on the 'Buchholz Family' has led to the publication of a volume of his short sketches. The 'Woodland Tales' are gracefully told, and are quite unlike the famous letters in style and scope, but they do not rise above the level of the ordinary short sketch written to order to fill a certain space in a magazine, and at times they are rather forced. They have the advantage of being well translated.

It is a pity that a short story should be cut down when the intention is to make it furnish forth a volume by itself, and especially when the story is cast in so simple a mould that it absolutely requires every word of the original to fill out the absence of incident. Evidently Count L. N. Tolstoi's 'Katia' was first translated to appear in some French publication where the space was limited; and the person who afterwards turned it into English was both unaware of the fact and unable to supply what was missing. The story as now presented to the English reader is, therefore, about one-fourth shorter than the original. The author gave it the significant title of 'Family Happiness,' which the reader will do well to bear in mind when he meets with allusions to Count Tolstoi's works. As the French translator understood the author's ideas better than he did himself, it is also natural that he should have changed the names about: for Katia read Masha all the way through, and vice versa. The sketch is one of the noted author's early and minor works, and, though pleasing and profound, to a certain degree, it lacks the power of his later writings. It is a simple, direct study of the love of a young girl for her elderly guardian, their marriage, and their speedy estrangement, arising from the different tastes natural to their different ages. The estrangement results in nothing worse or more exciting than a descent from their first fervent love to a friendly affection, and it is this gradual ebb of feeling which Masha (Katia) relates from her own point of view. It is chiefly interesting as being one of the author's first published attempts in that analysis of sentiments by which he has since so widely distinguished himself.

PRICE'S LONDON GUILDHALL.—II.

A Descriptive Account of the Guildhall of the City of London: its History and Associations. Compiled from Original Documents, with Facsimile Charters, Maps, and other Illustrations, by John Edward Price. Prepared by authority of the Corporation of the City of London under the Superintendence of the Library Committee. Pp. iii, 298. London. 1886.

We now pass to positive errors of fact, which are very numerous. On page 7 the author ascribes a document to "circa 12th century" which on page 16 he definitely says is of the early part of the reign of Henry I. Query: Does Mr. Price know what circa means? On page 8, rebuking Merewhether and Stephens for the weakness of their chronology, he italicizes the following words, which he ascribes to them: "The City of London continued without one (i. e., a Guildhall) until this reign, Henry VI." It should be "Henry IV." "Wardmotum" in the charter of Henry I., which is cited as one of the oldest references to the London wards (p. 15), is a false reading for "vadimonia," as the text of similar town charters plainly shows. The date commonly accepted for the expulsion of the Jews from England is 1290, not "1287 or 1289" (p. 21). On page 22 we read that the laws of King Edgar legislate concerning parishes; but the latter are not mentioned in those laws. The charter of King John to Andover does not "incorporate" the guild of merchants (p. 29). Henry II., not Henry I., was the grandfather of Henry III. (p. 30). The assertion on page 32 that "at one time the site [of the old Teutonic Steelyard] was the centre of London trade, and the scene of its complete monopoly by the merchants of the Hanseatic League," is absurdly incorrect. The charter of King John to the Cologne merchants, as Mr. Price informs us (p. 33), is printed by him for the first time, so far as he is aware; but he ought to be aware of the fact that the Charter Rolls of John's reign were published by the Record Commission, on page 194 of which publication he will find the charter referred to.

The Osney Chartulary in the British Museum is not "a collection of burnt fragments" (p. 35); at least three-quarters of the matter in its 275 folio pages is still legible. On pages 42, 43 we are informed that the liberties of London were in the hands of the King from 1273 to 1297; for 1273 substitute 1285. The author is wrong in saying that from the year 1252 the Husting Rolls of London "have retained an unbroken succession up to the present time" (p. 45). There is a break, extending from 1718 to 1837. He gives 1411 as the date of the rebuilding of the Guildhall (pp. 49, 50); but both of his sources, Stow (first edition) and Fabyan, make it 1410. On page 51 we find "Vitillars (Glaziers?)"; "vitillars" is plainly intended for "victuallers," and is not in the remotest degree to be confounded with "glaziers." "Sept., 1530, 31 Henry VIII.," "Nov., 20 Henry VI., A. D. 1504," "June, 1318, 8 Edward II.," and "1396, 12 Richard II." (pp. 13, 64, 184, 113) are impossible combinations; those regnal years correspond to 1539, 1441, 1315, and 1388–89, respectively. For "Portmole" on page 10, read Portmote; for "cuihtegild," on page 19, cnihtegild; for "at London," on page 29, at Oxford. The statement that the constitution of the Common Council "has never from the first day of its establishment been changed" (p. 167) is wholly untenable. We will stop to mention only one change. According to an ordinance of 1346, the Council was strictly representative, being chosen in the ward-motes by the commonalty or citizens at large; in 1375 it was enacted that the same body should be elected by the trading companies instead of the wards (Stubbs, Const. Hist., iii, 620; Norton, Commentaries, 114, 115). The earliest reference that the author finds to the Chamberlain of London (p. 178) is of the year 1275. That officer is frequently alluded to in the printed Rolls of the reign of John, for example, Close Rolls i, 4, 21. On page 188 "Mathew Paris, p. 501," is cited as a source for the reign of Henry V. That old chronicler had been in his grave more than 150 years when Henry V. ascended the throne. "Hinch-boy," a page, is not, as Mr. Price asserts, derived from haunch-boy on account of his "following the haunch of his master" (p. 198), but probably from the Anglo-Saxon "hengest," a horse. Skeat rightly speaks of the former derivation as "a desperate guess" and "a clumsy hybrid compound."

In palæography the author is even weaker than in history and philology. His transcript, on page 192, of a portion of a manuscript in the British Museum is a paragon of inaccuracy. The spelling of about one-half of the words varies from that of the original. There are also insertions, such as "in fine Gold" in the third line, and omissions. Here is a sample of his workmanship. He prints one of the entries thus:

> "ffor 5 Banners of half yarde square wrought, on silke with fine gold and silver 5 cap. . . . . Crowns gilt in oyle with fine gold and silver at 6l 8 - - - - - £1 13 4."

According to the manuscript it should read:

> "ffor 5 Baners of halfe yarde Square wrought one [i. e., on] Silke with fine gold and sillver - - - - - 080 [i. e., £3].
> ffor 5 Capatall Crowns gilt in oyle with fine gold and Sillver at 6 [s.] 8*d.* - - - - - [£] 1 13 [s.] [4*d*.]"

It now only remains for us to animadvert upon the author's crowning weakness. The construction of Latin throughout this books merits even harder words than Macaulay applied to Croker's edition of Boswell's Johnson. We have here to do with a very shallow Latinist, who parades before the public in the garb of an erudite editor of Latin originals. On page 30 there is a translation of a charter of Henry III. to Oxford occupying twenty lines, which contains some fifteen bad mistakes. Here are a few of them: "Et aliis pertinenciis suis" does not mean "and otherwise pertaining thereto," but plainly "and its other appurtenances." "Nullus qui non sit de gilda illa," not "no one who was not of the Gildall," but "no one who is not of that Gild." "And that they should have all liberties, customs, and laws which they have in common with his citizens of London. And that at his festival they should serve him (the King) as those of his Butlery. And should do merchandise with him." This should read, "And that they may have all their other customs, liberties, and laws which they have in common with our citizens of London, namely, that (scilicet, quod) at our festival they may serve us with those of our butlery; and may merchandise in common with them (cum eis)." "Et non aliter, quia" is translated "and otherwise because" instead of "and not otherwise; because," etc. The customary closing formula of English charters, "Quare volumus, et firmiter praecipimus quod," etc., is contorted into "which we will and that," etc. Glossarists differ as to the exact meaning of "them" in the phrase "et thol, et them," but all will unanimously agree in rejecting Mr. Price's new construction, namely, "beam."

We append three passages as the author presents them and as they stand in his sources: page 7, "a tempore quo Roma prima fundatur fuit, et civitatem Lundoniae eodem tempore fundatum," for "a tempore quo Roma primo fundata fuit, et civitatem Lundoniae eodem tempore fundatam"; page 11, "Civibus Londinae mediastinus, neque foeneratoribus neque officiosis negotiatoribus," for "Civibus Londoniae mediastinis, neque foenerantibus neque officiose negotiantibus"; page 12, "Hoec (i. e., London) etiam similiter illi (i. e., Rome) regionibus et distincta" for "Haec . . . est distincta." The phrase "anno regis nunc primo in hustengo de Communibus tento," when translated "in the first year of the King, that now is held in trust of the Community" (p. 31), is meaningless; it should be, "in the first year of the present King, in the Hustings of common pleas, held," etc. Mr. Price is certainly original in his construction of the surname of "Guillelmo Sene," which he translates "Old William" (p. 41). On pages 12 and 21 a manuscript is cited as the 'Annales Anglia.' This specimen of low Latinity is Mr. Price's, not that of the chronicler who wrote the 'Annales Angliae.' In the Latin on page 11, note 1, the comma is evidently used as the sign of contraction—a most confusing innovation. In the same passage "et altera" is printed instead of "ex altera"; "in cuj, rei fest, ego," instead of "in cujus rei testimonium ego"; "Alewy Diapero," instead of "Alewy Draperio"; "ex Lib. Osn. penes, Aedi Christi," instead of "ex Lib. Osn. penes Aedem Christi."

The attempt on p. 118 to reproduce the signs of contraction of the original is a failure. For "sciates," page 29, read "sciatis"; for "fermiter," 'quidum," "quas petent," and "per . . . maiorum," page 30, read "firmiter," "quidem," "quas petunt," "per . . . maiorem"; for "tempore Simonis de Swanlond maiore," "a partibus transmarinus," "corum," "dicta ville," page 31, read "tempore . . . maioris," "a partibus transmarinis," "coram," "dicte ville"; for "Johannes," "predictar', carectarum," page 52, read "Johanne," "predictarum carectarum"; for "in officia suo," page 71, "in officio suo"; for "hic . . . pacet," p. 130, "hic . . . jacet." Such mistakes as "emptus per ejusdem" and "per me Hugone" (pp. 126, 139) would almost make even an intelligent school-boy shudder. On page 253 the Latin epitaph of Whittington is copied from Weever's 'Funeral Monuments.' To the latter's conspicuous errors Mr. Price dexterously adds some of his own (for example, "altificans" for "albificans"; "gibi" for "sibi"; "presbiteorum" for "presbiterorum"). If the reader will compare this version with the correct one in Maitland's 'History of London,' p. 470 (London, 1739), he will understand what convulsions Latin undergoes in passing through Mr. Price's hands. In the epitaphs on pages 132 and 134 Holofernes would certainly "smell bad Latin," but as the originals are not accessible, we cannot tell how many of the mistakes are to be ascribed to Mr. Price.

We will conclude with two of the most notable memorials of the latter's egregious shiftlessness, namely, the documents on pages 139, 140. On page 139 words like "val," "tent," etc. (for "valet," "tenementum," etc.), appear without any mark of contraction. He prints "Pcett" for "P'cell'" ("parcellæ"); "Ry" for "R" or "Ri" ("Ricardus"); "omin' annorum" for "omni' (omnium) annorum"; "iii^{cio} R' cvi^{o}" for "iii^{cio} R' E' vi^{o}" ("tertio Regis Edwardi vi^{o}"). The words "Lond' Civit' 13" are incorporated in the text; in the original they stand by themselves on the dorse of the membrane. In the manuscript we meet the expression "per indenturam"; Mr. Price inserts mystic dots thus: "per . . . . . indenturam." Though the author does not mention the repository of the record printed on page 140, there can be little doubt that his source is 'Cardinal Pole's Pension Book,' deposited in the Public Record Office, London. At all events, we have there found the same matter, and thus are able to call Mr. Price to account for what he prints. His extract reads thus:

The Latin on page 40 and in the Appendix has evidently passed through abler hands than Mr. Price's.

A BRITISH SERGEANT.

The Autobiography of Sergeant William Lawrence, a Hero of the Peninsular and Waterloo Campaigns. Edited by George N. Bankes. London: Sampson Low & Co.

THE author of this autobiography was a private in the British Army during the Spanish campaigns of the Duke of Wellington. He was present at all the great battles, storms, and sieges from the skirmish at Roliça down to the last and bloody battle of Toulouse. By dint of sheer hard fighting, and the fortunate accident of being bullet-proof, he won his way to the rank of sergeant—that representing the highest rank to which, in those days, the British soldier, "fighting under the cold shade of aristocracy," was permitted to attain. On the return of Napoleon from Elba, his regiment was again ordered on service, and he passed unscathed through the battle of Quatre-Bras and "the world's earthquake, Waterloo." He had also considerable supplementary war services recorded to his credit against the Spanish settlements in South America, and against the United States. He was, in a word, an English bull-dog of the most hardy, tenacious, and fearless description. During the occupation of Paris by the Allies, he fell in love with and married a French girl, and on his return to England, having received from his grateful country the gigantic pension of ninepence a day, in complete acquittance of all he had done and endured for her, he closed the evening of his days as the keeper of a small public house near to the village in which he had been born.

Sergeant William Lawrence, despite the dignified position he held in Her Majesty's Army, never learned to write; and these reminiscences of his career were taken down by a village friend from his dictation. The Sergeant died in 1867, bequeathing the manuscript to the family one of whose members has now printed and published it for the advantage of the world. The autobiography is a plain, honest narrative of a great war from the point of view of a private soldier, and it shows what splendid fighting material Wellington must have had under his command. The Sergeant had his own conception of duty, and he cannot be accused of ever turning aside from it. He was always ready for a fight, but, as an individual, his one absorbing interest was in the matter of rations and of grog. Provided these were forthcoming regularly and in sufficient quantity, he and his comrades would seem to have accepted all other incidents of a campaign as part of the day's work, and not to have given them a second thought. A thrice-blessed deficiency of the imagination would seem to have relieved them of all anxiety respecting their own personal safety. This is amusingly exemplified in his account of the storming of Badajos:

"A storming party," he says, "was selected from each regiment, and each of the third, fourth, and light divisions was told off to a breach. I joined the forlorn hope myself. Before, however, that I proceed further in my account of this sanguinary affair, I will relate an engagement that myself, Pig Harding, and another of my comrades, George Bowden by name, entered into before we even started on our way, of which the result showed what a blind one it was. Through being quartered at Badajos after the battle of Talavera, all three of us knew the town perfectly well, and so understood the position of the most valuable shops; and hearing a report, likewise, that if we succeeded in taking the place there was to be three hours' plunder, we had planned to meet at a silversmith's shop that we knew about, poor Pig even providing himself with a piece of wax candle to light us if needed. But all this was doomed to disappointment. . . . I was one of the ladder party. On our arriving at the breach, the French sentry on the wall cried out, 'Who comes there?' three times, or words to that effect in his own language, but on no answer being given, a shower of shot—canister and grape, together with fire-balls—was hurled at random amongst us. Poor Pig received his death-wound immediately, Bowden became missing, whilst I myself received two small slug shots in my left knee and a musket shot in my side, which must have been mortal had it not been for my canteen."

Then follows an account of the unsuccessful efforts on the part of the British troops to surmount the chevaux-de-frise of sword-blades which the French had set up in the centre of the breach—efforts which had to be made under a deluge of fire poured in among them at close range. The breach was choked with the dead and dying. Lawrence tried to get out of the ditch by means of the scaling ladders by which the Forlorn Hope had descended into it, but found them all encumbered with dead or wounded soldiers, "hanging, some, by their feet just as they had fallen and got fixed in the rounds." At length, though faint and exhausted with loss of blood, he succeeded in extricating himself from the press and in making his way to the field hospital. His closing comments upon this murderous battle are characteristic:

"All being now over, thoughts of Pig Harding, George Bowden, and our engagement ran in my head, and how it had all failed; poor Pig having received seven shots in his body, and George Bowden having had both thighs blown off. Both must have met with instant death, and I myself had four wounds and was disabled for some time from getting about. I resolved then that I would never make any more engagements under the same fearful circumstances. We missed poor Pig more than any man of the regiment, for he passed many an hour away pleasantly with his jokes, being a thoroughbred Irishman; and not only that, but he supplied us with many an extra piece of tommy by his roguish tricks."

The meaning of this last characteristic of "poor Pig" is, that he was an adept in the business of supplementing the rations by pigs and other unconsidered trifles ingeniously "conveyed" from the population of the country. It is hardly necessary to point out the immense value, from a general's point of view, of the mental constitution which, on the eve of the storming of Badajoz, could concentrate itself, not upon the probable incidents of the assault, but upon a silversmith's shop in the centre of the town. The following is the Sergeant's account of the state of his regiment at four o'clock in the afternoon of the 18th of June, 1815:

"The men, in their tired state, were beginning to despair, but the officers cheered them on continually throughout the day with the cry of, 'Keep your ground, my men!' It is a mystery to me how it was accomplished, for at last so few were left that there were scarcely enough to form square. About four o'clock I was ordered to the colors. This, although I was used to warfare as much as any, was a job I did not at all like; but still I went as boldly to work as I could. There had been before me that day fourteen sergeants already killed and wounded while in charge of these colors, with officers in proportion, and the staff and colors were almost cut to pieces. This job will never be blotted from my memory; although I am now an old man, I remember it as if it had been yesterday. I had not been there more than a quarter of an hour when a cannon-shot came and took the Captain's head clean off. This was again close to me, for my left side was touching the Captain's right, and I was spattered all over with his blood. One of his company who was close by at the time cried out, 'Hallo, there goes my best friend'; which caused a lieutenant, who quickly stepped forward to take his place, to say to the man, 'Never mind, I will be as good a friend to you as the Captain.' The man replied, 'I hope not, sir'; the officer not having rightly understood his meaning—the late Captain having been particularly hard on him for his dirtiness, giving him extra duty and such like as punishment. The man, whose name was Marten, was a notorious character in the regiment, and I was myself tolerably well acquainted with him, for he had once been in my company, but on account of the same thing, dirtiness in his person, he had been transferred to the fifth company, where neither the poor Captain had been able to reform him, try however hard he might Still, he was for all this an excellent soldier in the field."

Extracts, however, can give little or no idea of the interest attaching to a book like this autobiography. Sergeant Lawrence is not an artist writing with an eye to the picturesque or the dramatic. Rather his account of himself is interesting because there is no striving after effect of any kind. He tells what he saw and what he did—he rarely seems to have suffered from the malady of thought, so tells us very little about that—without bombast or exaggeration, and, in his simple, unstudied way, opens out that most interesting of all sights to a student of history—veritable glimpses of the lives of the humble and the obscure in a world that has passed away.

Life of Henry Clay. By Carl Schurz. In two volumes. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 1887.

THE question which first presents itself in connection with the last publication in the "American Statesmen" series, is why two volumes should be devoted to Henry Clay when his great compeers, Webster and Calhoun, and even the founders of the republic, Hamilton, Jefferson, and others, have received only one. The answer is perhaps to be found in part in the personality of the man. He was certainly no greater man than Calhoun and Webster, and occupied no more prominent place than they in the public eye, while the careers of the three coincided to a remarkable degree in length and continuousness of activity. But Clay was the most picturesque character of the three, his individuality played a larger part in the history of his time, and his life was more full of incident than that of either of his rivals. No American statesman has ever had so strong a hold upon the affections of his countrymen; none has been so magnetic, in the true meaning of that much-abused word.

These considerations may account in part for the space allotted to Clay in this series; in part, too, no doubt, it is to be accounted for by the choice of his biographer. Mr. Schurz is not merely a writer, he is a statesman of large experience in public affairs; he is not merely a public man, he is a literary man and a thinker. More than any of the other biographers of the series, he approaches the life which he narrates from the two-fold point of view of history and practical politics. He has earnestly studied the history of American politics as a part of the life of the nation; and in writing the biography of a man whose public career covers nearly half of the years of our republican government, he has embodied in the work the fruits of these studies. In this book we have, therefore, what is really a political history of the United States, based upon the public life of Henry Clay—a history of American politics by Carl Schurz. Looked at in this light, the work before us appears as one of more than ordinary importance. If it were only a bare commentary upon American politics, its value, coming from this hand, would be great. But its literary merit is equally great. We all know how complete a mastery Mr. Schurz has acquired of the language of his adopted country, and it is no surprise to find his book written in pure and idiomatic English. But we were hardly prepared for so genial and entertaining a work. The life of his hero is not buried under a mass of philosophic reflection or subordinated to the political history of the times; it is a true biography, written in a style which carries the reader along by the very interest of the narrative.

There is another consideration besides the personality of the man which entitles Clay to an especially prominent place in the biographies of "American Statesmen." He may be regarded as, more than either Webster or Calhoun, the representative American statesman of his day. It has often been noted that his home in a border State, as well as his natural disposition, made him disposed to compromise, and he has come down to us, by the epithet which he would himself have chosen, of "the great compromiser"—an honorable epithet for a moderate statesman, exactly corresponding to that of "trimmer," chosen by Lord Halifax. For, although we were accustomed, in the days of the slavery contest, to reject the very idea of compromise, because a great moral principle was at stake, yet when there is no such principle involved, but the issue is one of policy, compromise is of the very essence of statesmanship. It was the misfortune of our country at that juncture that the question was not one of pure policy, but at bottom a question of public morality, which did not properly admit of compromise. It was impossible for Clay or even Webster to understand this; and so we had the melancholy spectacle of the greatest statesman, applying the most unquestionable rules of statesmanship, forced into fatal conflict with a strong and earnest sentiment of right. There is, no doubt, a danger in the compromise temper, not only when, as in this case, it is brought to bear upon questions which do not admit of compromise; and this danger is painfully apparent in Mr. Clay's attitude, even early in his career. One of the best passages in the book describes his vacillation or uncertainty of purpose in relation to the Missouri question (vol. i, p. 181):

"Clay's conduct with regard to the slavery question appears singularly inconsistent. It is impossible to believe that his condemnations of the system of slavery and his professions of hope that it would be extinguished were insincere. His feeling in this respect would occasionally burst out in an unpremeditated, unstudied, and unguarded way, as when, at this same period, while the Missouri struggle was going on in all its fury, he complimented the new South American republics for having emancipated their slaves. But the same man would advocate 'with great force' and 'in a speech of considerable length,' a bill to facilitate the catching of 'fugitives from justice and persons escaping from the service of their masters.' He would, in the Missouri struggle, 'go with his section' in doing what could be done at the time to secure the foothold of slavery in new States, and thus to facilitate the growth of its power. It is a remarkable circumstance, at the same time, that none of the speeches he made on the pro-slavery side, although they were mentioned in the record of the debaters, were reported, even in short outline. Did he suppress them? Did he dislike to see such arguments in print coupled with his name? We do not know. We shall find more such puzzles in his career."

Clay's course in his last great compromise is described with sympathy, although his policy itself is condemned (vol. ii, p. 356):

"There was no longer any vulgar ambition disturbing him. The old man felt that his endeavors must find their reward in themselves. 'I am here,' he said, 'expecting soon to go hence, and owing no responsibility but to my own conscience and to God.' Neither had he approached the problem to be solved with his old dictatorial spirit. Time and again he had assured the Senate that he was not wedded to any plan of his own, and that he would be most grateful for the suggestion of measures more promising than those proposed by him as to the pacification of the country. He had sacrificed the Wilmot Proviso, the adoption of which would have accorded best with his natural impulses. He had made concession after concession to the defenders of slavery, much against his sympathies."

Of the compromise Mr. Schurz says (p. 371):

"One effect it produced which Calhoun had already predicted when he warned the slaveholding States against compromises as an invention of the enemy: it adjourned the decisive conflict until the superiority of the North over the South in population and material resources was overwhelming, and, as it happened, until a party, and at its head a man, held the helm of affairs, whose anti-slavery principles and aims made it sure that the cause of the mischief would not in any form survive the issue of the struggle."

Mr. Schurz had already said (p. 338):

"From the pro-slavery point of view, Calhoun was unquestionably right. The slaveholding States would have been more able to hold their own in 1820 than in 1850, and more in 1850 than they proved to be in 1861."

We do not know of any book of like compass so well suited as this to give young Americans a knowledge of the history of their country during those stirring years—at once accurate, graphic, and pervaded with a strong moral sense. It is only a pity the story does not come down ten years later.

A History of the Baptists: Traced by their Vital Principles and Practices, from the Time of Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ to the year 1886. By Thomas Armitage, D.D., LL.D. With an Introduction by J. L. M. Curry, D.D., LL.D., American Minister to Spain. Illustrated by 175 engravings. New York: Bryan, Taylor & Co. 1887. Pp. xviii, 978.

THE preface assures us that this work was "not written on the current methods of ecclesiastical history." The method actually followed would seem to be that of the Parisian chronicler who adopted as the motto of one of his works, "This I allude to lest anything should be left unsaid." We have here a system of theology properly to be described, after the style of a seminary endowment, as "both didactical and polemical"; a treatise on Christian antiquities; a history of the Church for nineteen centuries, with generous slices of secular history thrown in; a dictionary of Christian biography; and an ample store of Baptist statistics, ecclesiastical, educational, literary, and missionary. Really, considering the immense range of treatment demanded of him by his publishers, Dr. Armitage's thousand pages are a surprisingly little room to contain such infinite riches. The general reader may, indeed, complain of the sermonic leisurelness of the style in many chapters, and of the somewhat alarming tendency to bring in extraneous matter (thus Milton, "whether a Baptist or not"—i. e., though not a Baptist—"demands our notice," to the extent of eight pages); but he should remember that not for him but for the denominational reader and the denominational book agent was the 'History' written.

Happily for ourselves, we are absolved from dealing with the controversial parts of the book. We may express, however, our admiration for the thorough way in which the author's adversaries are left, in every case, with not a leg to stand on; though they will be moved, we fear, to something like mirth at his intrepid handling of the Callixtine frescoes and the Ravenna mosaic, and will be tempted to call his allusions to the baptismal regulations of the "Teaching" slighting, to say the least. The Baptist theory of the church, as stated by Dr. Armitage, is that a perfect model was given in the first century, after which the church is always exactly to be formed. "At the close of the first century, Christianity stands in its ideal beauty, fresh from Christ, . . . and in the pure mould which inspired apostles had formed, without one defect from the touch of human governments" (p. 148). This seems to us to be decidedly an "ideal" rendering of history. The perfect model is not to be found in the first century; if it were, it could not be recovered; if it could, it had best not be. The commoner Protestant theory, which admits great changes since the apostolic church, has a juster historic sense.

We are glad to bear testimony to the patient industry and research displayed by Dr. Armitage. His authorities, if not numerous, are of the best. Especially fresh and valuable are his chapters on the German and Welsh Baptists. On the colonial period he is full and able. The chapter on foreign missions is disappointingly meagre. The author's faculty for minute inquiry and ingenious hypothesis is well exhibited in the long effort to prove, in the face of an authentic and apparently decisive parish record, that Bunyan did not have his infant son baptized. We should think the glowing praise which he bestows upon some of his living denominational associates in shocking taste, did we not remember that, such is the standard of ministerial courtesy, they would have considered it shocking taste in him if he had pursued any other course.

Due North, or Glimpses of Scandinavia and Russia. By Maturin M. Ballou. Boston: Ticknor & Co. 1887.

MR. BALLOU takes us in a single sentence to Copenhagen, and there his observations begin. From the Danish capital he goes to "Gottenburg," then up the Norway coast to Christiania, Bergen, Throndhjem, Hammerfest, and the North Cape, "which," we are informed, "was the objective point to reach which we had voyaged thousands of miles from another hemisphere." Returning from the Cape to Christiania, he travels across the country to Stockholm, whence, in due time, a Baltic steamer carries him to St. Petersburg. From there he goes to Moscow and Nizhni-Novgorod, and returns thence to Warsaw. With Warsaw the book ends.

The volume consists simply of a flying tourist's observations and impressions, and is for the most part the plain, unvarnished tale of a sensible and experienced traveller. Only now and then is there an attempt at humor or a bit of more ambitious description. Such a book is very properly called "Glimpses," and its only merit lies in the faithfulness with which the traveller describes what he saw with his own eyes and the impression it made upon him. As long as Mr. Ballou sticks to this simple rôle he is interesting and readable; but where, as often happens, he introduces criticism, erudition, or philosophical reflections, then the traces of haste and of superficial knowledge are pretty sure to show themselves. It is, in fact, a weakness of his to express himself freely about matters which he knows little about, and has not the time or the disposition to look up. To this damaging count we must add another, namely, a habit of basing important statements upon guesswork, hearsay, or perhaps the authority of some untrustworthy guide-book. One or two illustrations will show what our author is capable of in these directions:

On page 17 we read, "The Danish language is a modified form of the Old Gothic which prevailed in the earliest historic ages."

Page 372: "The Polish language as spoken by the people of Warsaw is indeed a puzzle to the stranger, being a sort of Slavic-Indo-European tongue."

On page 181, speaking of Linnæus and Swedenborg, Mr. Ballou observes: "The latter graduated at the famous University of Upsala, the former in the greater school of outdoor Nature." Again of Linnæus, page 188: "This humble shoemaker by force of his genius alone rose to be a prince in the kingdom of science." Linnæus was never a shoemaker; he studied at Lund and Upsala, and took his degree at Harderwyk in the Lowlands.

Page 188: "Among the latter [i. e., the important manuscripts in the University library at Upsala] is a copy of the four Gospels, with movable silver letters placed on parchment at the chapter heads, the whole being in the Old Gothic language. This book, named 'Codex Argenteus,' contains nearly two hundred folios, and was made by Bishop Ulphilas one thousand years before Gutenberg was born." Mr. Ballou is possibly not aware that these are the two funniest sentences in his book. They would deserve a place in some future treatise upon "Sight-Seeing as She is Done."

Speaking of the National Museum at Stockholm, our author says (p. 183): "As regards the curiosities collected here, they are in no way remarkable, being much like those of other collections." Mr. Ballou seems to have been in an unpropitious mood for museums that day, else why such language concerning one of the finest ethnological collections in the world? Even the calm Baedeker draws especial attention to it through his familiar machinery of double asterisks, and adds: "An Vollständigkeit und Zweckmässigkeit der Anordnung sucht das Museum seines Gleichen."

On page 114 we read concerning the University of Lund: "The number of students attached thereto we could not learn, but we saw them in goodly numbers, living in separate lodgings about the town, and only coming together at the period of recitations and public lectures. The system of instruction here is unique; enough was learned to satisfy one of that, but the details were not clearly defined." One would think that information so vacuous as this would hardly have been thought worth printing; but there is not a little such matter in the volume.

On page 174 it is observed that the Royal Library at Stockholm "is said to be a very choice collection of books in all modern languages, . . . and contains a hundred thousand bound volumes." A quarter of a million is the correct figure.

On page 265 we are told that the Russian Empire embraces nearly two-thirds of the earth's surface, and covers an area of eighty million square miles; which sounds as if our tourist had fallen into the hands of a committee engaged in "booming" the Russian Empire.

Of literary criticism we get but little in these pages, but the following gem is to be found on page 249: "The modern school of Russian romance writers is not founded upon the vicious French standard, but rather upon the best English; not upon that of Balzac and Dumas, but upon Thackeray and George Eliot."

To sum up: Mr. Ballou can tell a fairly interesting story of personal observations and experiences, but he is not a writer to pin one's faith to in matters of solid information.

Dante. A Sketch of his Life and Works. By May Alden Ward. Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1887.

A LIFE of Dante which should not attempt too much has been a desideratum of our libraries, and the present unpretentious but sufficient work fills the empty place very acceptably. It is not too long, and does not enter into the vexed questions of Dante's biography, or try to be a commentary on his poems or even an abstract of his times. It gives a view of the state of parties in Florence when Dante was born, and the subsequent history of politics so far as they concerned him, without confusion and without any romancing sentiment. The author then follows his wanderings, keeping within the ascertained limits of fact, and not weaving problems and hypotheses by the way; in short, she picks out the certainties, and so simplifies the story. Italy, the Popes, and the nobles of the cities are described and given their place in the scenes; but all this is made to appear, just what it is, the historic background of Dante as a man and poet. The result is such an unconfused outline biography as is needed—one sufficient for the ordinary student at the start and capable of indefinite filling in.

When the subject of the works of Dante is reached, the same moderation is practised. The order of them in time, their topics, and their relation to contemporary culture and belief, are treated of simply and directly, but they are not analyzed or mystified or modernized for hasty readers without the preparation necessary to apprehend their meaning; and when the 'Divine Comedy' takes its turn, it is told over in prose only as a journey, as a mere narrative of fact, but in such a way as greatly to facilitate the passage of one desirous of following the poet, but unused to such hard climbing and rough descents. This general view of the poem, in its primary meaning, is of real service to the uninitiated. We do not see how any one of ordinary ability and the patience needful to any study of the highest poetry, can fail to obtain a useful knowledge of Dante by the aid of this little work and the notes which accompany the ordinary translated texts. An annotated list of the most necessary books for thorough study of the poet is added at the end of the volume.

The Phillips Exeter Lectures. Lectures delivered before the Students of Phillips Exeter Academy, 1885–1886. By Presidents McCosh, Walker, Bartlett, Robinson, Porter, and Carter, and Rev. Drs. Hale and Brooks. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 1887.

THESE are such lectures as educated people would desire their sons to hear. With the exception of that upon Socialism, by President Walker, which is already before the public, they are new, and they show what some of the chief educators of the time, in college and in the pulpit, think best worth saying to boys who are to enter life through the higher education; they are therefore adapted to a much wider audience than that of the Exeter Academy, and may be read with equal profit by all young men who are beginning at college or seeking to be students in more humble ways. Most of them deal, in one or another form, with the "ideal scholar," and set forth his aims, habits, means of work, etc., in language and with illustrations fitted to young hearers; but the scholastic ideal, as presented, is less hard and fast than might have been expected, though the common defence of Greek and the patronage extended to science as a new-comer are noticeable. The modern languages seem to have entirely passed the probationary stage. The moral element is pronounced, the gymnastic is not absent, and the religious is put forward kindly, temperately, and firmly, in a singularly simple and practical Christian spirit. The dominant idea, perhaps, of all, with the exception noted above, is that youth is a period for inspiration even more than for acquisition; and the aim of the speakers was to touch the boys' lives, and to show them how themselves to touch them, to "fine issues." Phillips Brooks alone drops the exhortatory method, and, in an excellent sermon on biography, teaches by example, and names books to be read. A body of young men is lucky that has such instruction; the mere presence and living voice of such men bears to the youthful student a sense of intellectual comradeship of the most inspiring force.

Mineral Physiology and Physiography: a Second Series of Chemical and Geological Essays, with a General Introduction. By Thomas Sterry Hunt, M.A. 8vo, pp. xvii, 710. Boston: S. E. Cassino. 1886.

In this massive volume Dr. Hunt has brought together and emended some of his more important contributions to the literature of geology which have appeared since the publication of his 'Chemical and Geological Essays' in 1874. Although all the chapters in this book except the sixth have for some time been at the service of his fellow-students, geologists will find that they owe the author their thanks for the unity which is secured in this better form of presentation. The science of geology is not, like mathematics or chemistry, a distinct branch of learning. We ought, in fact, to speak of it in the plural, as the sciences of geology. In its problems nearly every method and instrument of research is demanded. The result is, that the advance of geology is not made along one line of march, but by many parallel lines, and these separate divisions do not move with much harmony. The first triumphs were won by the physical geologists; then the palæontologists had their measure of success. The students of the chemistry of the earth were long regarded as feeble allies, but now it seems that it is their turn to lead in discovery. They are winning the most from the unknown.

The first essay in this volume concerns the "nature of thought and language." It is an admirable and scholarly defence of the use which is made of the terms Physiology and Physiography in the title of the work. It is, in fact, a plea for a recognition in the terminology of our earth sciences of that unity which is confessed in the principles that guide our modern students of nature. The second brief essay is on the "order of the natural sciences," and proposes a classification of those branches of learning which is at once simple and comprehensive. In the third essay, on the "chemical and geological relations of the atmosphere," Dr. Hunt gives a most important extension to the work done by Berthier and Ebelmen on the decomposition of felspars and of protosilicates such as amphibole and olivine. Reviewing Ebelmen's data, he shows that the decay of enough felspar to form a layer of kaolen 500 metres in thickness over the whole earth would require an amount of carbonic dioxide equal to more than twenty-one times the weight of the present atmosphere of the earth. So, too, the limestone, the coal, and the other forms of fixed carbon in the rocks show that many thousand times the volume of the carbon in our atmosphere must have been taken from it and buried in the earth. It is obviously impossible that this amount of carbonic dioxide could ever at one time have existed in the air. The continued existence of air-breathing animals from a very remote period of the earth's history is, of itself, a complete disproof of this supposition.

Whence, then, came this supply of carbon to the atmosphere? how did it come in such a measured way that there was never either lack of it or an over-supply? The common notion of geologists is, that it is constantly returned to the air by volcanoes and other subterranean agents which disengage oxidised carbon. The author shows that this explanation is entirely insufficient, and proposes the hypothesis that the carbon, with other elements of our atmosphere, exists in space in a thinly diffused form, and is slowly but constantly gathered to the earth as it swings through space. This idea of the earth feeding on the diffused matter of space has suggested itself to many speculative physicists, yet Dr. Hunt is the first to show that it is not an idle fancy, but what seems to be the only explanation of the most puzzling fact with which geologists have to deal.

The body of this work naturally concerns the history of the crystalline rocks. More than two hundred pages are given to the problems connected with this part of the geological sciences. Many students will contend against the details of these chapters, but the unprejudiced inquirer will find in them the most suggestive considerations concerning this group of rocks which have been published. With a simple and seemingly irrefragable proposition the author clears the way for his inquiry: it is, that "the history of the origin of crystalline rocks is the history of the origin of the mineral species which compose them." In the development of his "crenitic hypotheses" we have what seems to the present writer the most satisfactory view of metamorphism which has yet been advanced. It combines the facts which were already in the possession of the science with a great amount of original investigation into a coherent and logical whole. In the essay on "A Natural System of Mineralogy," the author endeavors to show how far it is possible for us to institute a classification of minerals which shall be like in nature to that which we apply to organic species. It is an effort, in the light of modern science, to return to the discarded system of Werner and of his pupil, Mohs. It indicates a striking feature in all Dr. Hunt's work, viz., an effort toward the unification of our conception of nature. The success which has attended this endeavor will have to be determined by the patient criticism of those who are special students in the department of mineralogy. As applied to the group of silicates, to which, in the main, the essay is limited, the method appears to be successful; it brings together in natural groups a host of forms which are widely scattered in the classifications now in vogue. We shall await with great interest the system of mineralogy, based on the same principles, which the author is now preparing.

The later chapters of the book concern the pre-Cambrian rocks, serpentines, and the Taconic question. The essay on serpentines is of the most immediate value, as it conclusively shows that this group of rocks is normally if not invariably of aqueous origin. But it is impossible to do justice to the matter of these essays in a notice of this nature. They are full of the results of laborious research, and singularly rich in their references to the labors of others. Containing a great deal which is original, they necessarily contain much which is debatable—much that will be furiously debated. But even to the holders of entirely opposite views, they are sure to be suggestive of truth. The book is well made, and there is an admirable index to it.

Rapport sur les questions relatives à l'impôt sur le revenu. Par Yves Guyot. Paris: Guillaumin & Cie. 1887.

M. Guyot has republished as an octavo volume a report made by him at the request of the French Budget Commission on questions connected with proposals relating to the establishment of an income tax in France. Several chapters are devoted to descriptions of income and property taxes in the United States, Germany, Italy, Switzerland, and the United Kingdom. The author gives estimates, taken from the best sources available, of the comparative wealth of France, Great Britain, and the United States.

In France one great fiscal wrong is the inequality of the assessments of real property in the different departments. This is increased by the fact that the French land tax is not levied at the same rate on all property, but the proportion of the whole amount which is to be paid by each department is fixed by the central authority; the departments allot the quotas to be paid by the several communes, and the communal authorities apportion their quota among the individual taxpayers. The tax is, to use the French technical term, one of répartition and not of quotité. If it were the latter, each taxpayer would pay in proportion to his property; the rate of the tax would be fixed by the Government, instead of the amount to be raised from each department. The valuation on which this tax is levied is the net annual value, and was fixed unsystematically and imperfectly from fifty to seventy years ago; the value of real property has changed, but the original assessment is still in force. The result is, that some departments pay from six to eight times as much as others in proportion to their real annual value.

M. Guyot advocates a tax on the capital in place of on the annual value. There is, as he points out, a manifest injustice in taxing the same amount of capital at different rates, according to the mode in which it is invested. In France a capitalist might invest his money in building ots, or other land temporarily unproductive, but held for resale at a profit. The investment, yielding no income, would practically escape taxation. If the same sum were invested in safe securities yielding an income of three per cent., the tax would be levied on that income; while if placed in business where, though it might temporarily yield twelve per cent., the loss of the whole would be risked, the owner would pay four times as heavy a tax as in the previous case.

The same objections have been frequently urged against the income tax in England, but there a difficulty exists in the way of assessing the capital value of land, viz., that land is generally the subject of letting, and seldom of sale. In France, however, not only are there nearly a million sales of land each year, but on every devolution by inheritance the capital value of the land is officially registered. The ascertainment of the capital value of the entire country would be an easy matter, and such an assessment would be of more durable benefit than an official estimate of the annual value, which, necessarily varying from year to year, would be a much more fluctuating and uncertain basis for taxation than the selling value.

The reforms proposed by M. Guyot would increase the land tax in those departments which are undervalued; and he estimates that a revaluation for taxation would cost ten million dollars, and that it would take ten years to complete. He thinks the complaint by landowners of overtaxation generally is unfounded; but he would nevertheless relieve them in the interest of free-trade principles from the vexatious and heavy duties on transfers, which, with legal expenses, make the costs of sales amount to 10 per cent. of the price paid. This heavy impost prevents sales, and its removal should be supplemented by establishing a simple system of transfer on the record-of-title principle. These reforms, which involve equality of taxation and free trade in land, are, in M. Guyot's opinion, essential to the well-being of France, whose greatest wealth consists in her land. Fifty per cent. of the population are engaged in agriculture, and, without releasing them from their fair share of the public burdens, they should be placed in such circumstances as will permit land to pass into the possession of those who are most capable of working it to advantage.

This book, written by one of the ablest French economists, and a practical statesman, is well worth the attention of students of finance and politics.

The Memoirs

OF THE

MARGRAVINE of BAIREUTH.

Translated and Edited by

H.R.H. PRINCESS CHRISTIAN.

In 8vo, cloth, extra, $3.75.

The Margravine was the sister of Frederick the Great, and exerted great influence over his character. Her Diary is a wonderful narrative of the petty intrigues and gossip of the German Court.

The Volume will have as Frontispiece an Autotype Copy of the Portrait in Berlin.

 Princess Christian, during her recent stay in Berlin, devoted much time and attention to the completion of the English edition of the Memoirs of Wilhelmine, Margravine of Baireuth, sister of Frederick the Great, which the Princess intends to bring out in London a few weeks hence. The Princess has for this edition written a special introduction, explaining in a very interesting manner the main features of the general situation in Europe, and especially in Germany, at that time. In order to prepare herself for this task the Princess has made a diligent study of the original manuscripts in the Berlin Royal Library, the documents being placed at her disposal by the Crown Prince's special request. In the course of her studies the Princess discovered an excellent portrait of the Magravine by Pesne; and this, in the form of a beautifully executed autotype, is to stand as the frontispiece of the book.

LONDON IN 1887.

New, Revised, and Enlarged Edition. Illustrated by 18 Bird's-eye Views of the Principal Streets. Also by a Map showing its Chief Suburbs and Environs. Originally compiled by HERBERT FRY. Seventh Year of Issue, Revised and Enlarged, 12mo, cloth, 80 cents.

CUCUMBER CHRONICLES.

A book to be taken in slices.

By J. ASHBY-STERRY, author of 'The Lazy Minstrel,' 'Tiny Travels,' &c., &c. Fcap 8vo, cloth extra, gilt top, with Four Collotype Illustrations. $2.00.

Extracts from some opinions of the London Press:

The World: "Keen observation, undiluted good-humor and easy badinage are, as usual, the chief characteristics of Mr. Sterry's style."

Saturday Review: "A capital book for a lounge in the hammock and a hot day in the shade."

Daily Telegraph: "There is nothing labored in the fun and fancy, the picturesqueness, and good-humored grace which overrun these pages."

Morning Post: "Refreshing as becomes its title, the author's book will afford genuine pleasure to the cultivated reader."

Observer: "The deft touch, the sympathetic fancy, and the ever-genial humor of Mr. Ashby-Sterry have seldom been employed to such advantage as in the dainty little volume of essays just published."

Athenæum: "Mr. Ashby-Sterry's essays have a pleasant air of geniality and good spirits."

Whitehall Review: "In themselves light literature, the graceful little essays contain so many allusions to solid and serious writings that they can only be duly appreciated either by intelligent students of ancient or modern lore or by quick-witted amateurs anxious to become learned."

"The respectable and sometimes excellent translations of Bohn's Library have done for Literature what railroads have done for internal intercourse."—R. W. Emerson.

"I may say in regard to all manner of books, Bohn's Publication Series is the usefullest thing I know."—Thomas Carlyle.

"Notwithstanding the great number of books on China, there is at this time room for another, which should briefly tell what China and the Chinese were before foreign influences had materially changed them, what foreigners have done for or forced them to do, and what remains for foreigners to do, with the prospect of their doing it. In other words, it should make progress in China its burden and text, and in the narrative which follows I have kept that text constantly in mind, and aimed to give the reader the materials for forming an intelligent opinion in reference to it."—From the Preface.

American Society for Psychical Research.

The Research work of the Society is at present divided between five Committees:

1. The Committee on Thought-Transference is engaged in ascertaining whether a vivid impression or a distinct idea in one mind can be communicated to another without the intervening help of the recognized organs of sensation.

2. The Committee on Apparitions and Haunted Houses wishes to collect accounts, from trustworthy sources, of apparitions of absent or deceased persons, of premonitions, whether these occur in dreams or in the waking state, of disturbances in houses described as "haunted," and of any cognate phenomena.

3. The Committee on Hypnotism is engaged in the study of the mesmeric or hypnotic trance, with the object of ascertaining its causes and of elucidating its psychical and physiological accompaniments.

4. The Committee on Mediumistic Phenomena is chiefly concerned with the experimental investigation of the phenomena commonly described as "Spiritualistic," and is particularly desirous of obtaining opportunities for investigation with private and unpaid "mediums," or other persons in whose presence "mediumistic" phenomena occur.

5. The Committee on Experimental Psychology is making investigations in folk-thought or the study of sociology in its psychological aspects. It seeks to ascertain the psychical characteristics which many individuals may possess in common in virtue of their being members of particular races or communities.

Communications are earnestly requested from all persons interested in any branch of the work of the Society.

The Memoirs
OF THE
MARGRAVINE of BAIREUTH.

Translated and Edited by
H.R.H. PRINCESS CHRISTIAN.

In 8vo, cloth, extra, $3.75.

The Margravine was the sister of Frederick the Great, and exerted great influence over his character. Her Diary is a wonderful narrative of the petty intrigues and gossip of the German Court.

The Volume will have as Frontispiece an Autotype Copy of the Portrait in Berlin.

 Princess Christian, during her recent stay in Berlin, devoted much time and attention to the completion of the English edition of the Memoirs of Wilhelmine, Margravine of Baireuth, sister of Frederick the Great. The Princess has for this edition written a special introduction, explaining in a very interesting manner the main features of the general situation in Europe, and especially in Germany, at that time. In order to prepare herself for this task the Princess has made a diligent study of the original manuscripts in the Berlin Royal Library, the documents being placed at her disposal by the Crown Prince's special request. In the course of her studies the Princess discovered an excellent portrait of the Magravine by Pesne; and this, in the form of a beautifully executed autotype, is to stand as the frontispiece of the book.

An Illustrated Chronicle of Fifty Years of the Reign of Her Majesty the Queen, pictorially arranged with annals of the time, from the contemporary pages of Punch. To be completed in from ten to twelve monthly numbers. Each number 4to, price 80 cents.

"'Mr. Punch's Victorian Era' consists of the leading cartoons and illustrations which have adorned the pages of Punch during the past fifty years, and thus refreshes our memory with regard to those great political and social questions which have agitated the world during that period. The work expresses a most happy idea."—Newcastle Courant.

"The pictorial presentation of events is perhaps one of the best means of fixing them upon the mind; and when such illustrations are accompanied by a judicious letterpress, the receptiveness of the mind is enhanced and the process of study becomes a source of satisfaction. Mr. Punch's idea during the Victorian era are well worthy of reproduction as a souvenir and retrospect. 'Mr. Punch's Victorian Era' is a brief and abstract chronicle of what is most important in the British story."—Bristol Observer.

In Ole Virginia.

Marse Chan and Other Stories.

By THOMAS NELSON PAGE.

Including 'Unc' Edinburg's Drowndm',' Meh Lady, Ole 'Stracted, 'No Haid Pawn,' and Polly. Cloth, 12mo, $1.25.

"It is not in the comparative small matter of language that the author shows his qualifications as a writer of fiction. His ability reaches to the depths of nature, inanimate, brute, and human. He is in tune with each, intellectually and æsthetically, and touches with almost unerring hand the unseen keys of human thought, emotion, and action. His stories are told in the simplest and most straightforward manner, and the negro dialect is found quite equal to all their turns of love, pride, anger, pathos, courage, heroism, and grief. They are, indeed, quite competent to found a literature in their line. There is unmistakably the light of genius shining out of them. The touches of nature that make the whole world kin are constant, and leave no intelligent taste anything to desire in the language by which they are conveyed."—Brooklyn Eagle.

"A writer rarely springs more suddenly into the fulness of popularity than has the author of these strong and artistic tales. The charm of the stories is threefold: in the perfection of the negro dialect, in the capital story-telling, and in the faithful reproduction of the lights and shades of the old-time Virginia life."—The Christian Union.

"The author belongs to the old Virginia 'quality'; he knows the life of the people; he knows the negro well, and renders his dialect perfectly; he has an eye for the picturesque, the poetic, and the humorous, and his style shows exquisite artistic taste and skill. . . . We believe Mr. Page to be the brightest rising star in our Southern literature."—Nashville American.

The Story of a New York House.

By H. C. BUNNER.

Illustrated by A. B. Frost. Cloth, 12mo, $1.25.

"Mr. Bunner's most eminent characteristic is an exquisite taste, a faultless literary breeding, and in this book is shown his unerring instinct of literary refinement. The story must not be judged as a novel: it is not a figure-piece, but rather a landscape into which figures are slightly sketched. As such, however, it is one of the artistic successes of the year."—New York World.

"There is an infinite pathos and charm in the story, in the pictures of a life that would now seem to us to be old-fashioned, in the studies of character which fill the pages, and in the deft and artistic method by which we are brought to see how hard it is to uproot old memories, and how they cling to us through all social changes. The people whom we meet are real, their joys and sorrows for the time being become our own, and in every line there is a marked individuality and originality, and traces of an exquisite and dainty art."—Philadelphia Record.

"It is a great pleasure to come upon a piece of fine conscientious work like this little story of Mr. Bunner's, which shows in every page a true artistic feeling. We value it not only for the neatness and grace of the style, but for the symmetry of the construction, just balance of sentiment, and an indefinable beauty of tone which is perfectly sustained from the first page to the last."—New York Tribune.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JUNE 30, 1887.

The Week.

THE investigations made in Cincinnati respecting the failure of the Fidelity National Bank disclose the most graceless and brazen frauds that have come to light since James D. Fish gutted the Marine Bank in this city. Every variety of swindling was resorted to. Money was taken out of the bank to the amount of $1,000,000, and nothing put in its place but memorandum slips of paper, showing who had taken it. Bank stock was issued that was not authorized by law, and was sold or hypothecated for money to be used in the "wheat deal" at Chicago. False statements of the bank's condition were made and forwarded to Washington, under oath, of course. Such an accumulation of penalties under the National Banking Law has seldom been brought together. When we recall these penalties and the exemplary severity with which they are commonly enforced, we are moved to wonder why Harper, Baldwin, and Hopkins are not now in Canada instead of waiting for the action of the Grand Jury in Cincinnati. The only palliation discovered by their friends up to this time is, that the Chicago Board of Trade is to blame for altering its rules and making a greater quantity of wheat "regular" than they expected to be obliged to take. In other words, they went to Chicago not to corner wheat, but to corner storage room. What they ought to have bought was warehouses, not No. 2 spring. This is interesting, but it will not go far with a jury.

We have felt sure for some days past that it would be discovered by somebody that President Cleveland was in some manner to blame for the recent financial troubles. Our readers may remember that a hardware house in this city, which failed last year, ascribed their downfall to his nomination. As soon, they said, as his nomination began to be talked of even, the demand for steel springs began to fall off. People said they should use only very few steel springs until they saw whether he would run for the Presidency. When he was actually elected, of course, they ceased buying steel springs altogether, and down came the house. Now comes Senator Sherman and says: "The recent business troubles in Ohio are the possible forerunners of financial depression, for which he blames the inefficiency of President Cleveland's Administration." We quote this from a Tribune "special." What other cause could there be? When he came into power the speculators got together and said, "Now is the time for corners in wheat and coffee," and got permission from the Administration to get up one on a large scale in each article. At the same time Hopkins and Harper determined, if he approved, to rob the Fidelity Bank, and telegraphed to Washington to know whether any notice would be taken of a considerable bank robbery in connection with the corners. On receiving the laconic answer that "they were to go ahead," they plunged into crime, with the result we now witness.

A gallant effort has been made by Mr. Sherman, in an interview with a reporter of the Cincinnati Commercial Gazette, to reconcile his Nashville and Springfield speeches. He maintains that there was no inconsistency between them, because his Springfield speech was an "historical statement," while his Nashville speech was "made to persuade the people of the South that their material interests would be promoted by the policy of the Republican party." In other words, he was telling the Springfield people what a bad lot the Southerners were, but he was telling the Nashville people that there was money in the "Republican policy." He will not retract either speech now, because he says he always governs his conduct simply by "the rule of right," and cares little for "the rule of policy." In fact, he is apparently one of the simple sort known as "Plutarch's men."

It turns out that at the very time when Adjt.-Gen. Drum was organizing his scheme for a general return of the rebel flags, representatives of an Ohio and a Louisiana regiment were in correspondence with reference to the return of one banner. On the 28th of July, 1864, the Forty-sixth Ohio captured the flag of the Thirtieth Louisiana in front of Atlanta, and it was deposited in the Ohio State-house. The survivors of the Ohio regiment are to hold a reunion in August, and some time ago they decided to return the flag, provided the State authorities would surrender it to them. Accordingly a letter was sent to the Adjutant-General of Louisiana asking his assistance in reaching members of the regiment from that State, as it was desired to have some of them present at the reunion. In due time a committee of the Louisianians acknowledged the receipt of the communication, returned cordial thanks for the offer, and expressed the hope that the Ohio State authorities would allow the purpose to be carried out, as "such acts, accepted in the spirit of conciliation and good-fellowship in which they are meant, have done and are doing much to bring about that era of fraternity which all good citizens desire to see entertained by the people of all parts of our country." This last letter was written early in June, just before the recent outbreak on the flag question, and whether Gov. Foraker will now consent to "recognize the success of the rebellion" by giving his consent to the removal of the colors from the State-house, remains to be seen.

The death of Craig Tolliver of Rowan County, Kentucky, after having defied the Sheriff and the courts for many years, and taken some part in the murder of about thirty men, closes a very curious episode in social life. His final freak in getting himself elected justice of the peace, and then issuing warrants for his enemies, and inflicting capital punishment on them as soon as they were arrested, is surely one of the most grotesque incidents of Western politics. But Tolliver was a product of the period before the war, and of a kind of civilization which has been disappearing since the war. He could not have existed in any community which had got out of the barbarous stage, in which physical courage is considered by far the highest of virtues, and in fact a sufficient substitute for most others.

Attention has been directed lately to the increasing amount of silver certificates outstanding, about $139,000,000 at the present time, and the silver men have improved the occasion to say that all the predictions of disaster to result from continued silver coinage have been falsified, since no disaster whatever has resulted. It is not considered a disaster to have accumulated nearly $80,000,000 of unused silver dollars over and above the amount of certificates outstanding; but the fact that it is not such must be attributed to the wealth of the country, to its ability to "carry" the stuff without feeling the burden. The carrying capacity of the country is much greater than any strain that has been put upon it yet. Nobody anticipated, when the Silver-Coinage Act was passed, that national-bank notes to the amount of more than $100,000,000 would be speedily retired through the payment of the public debt, and that another large vacuum in the circulation would be made by the cancellation of the one and two-dollar greenbacks. The space filled by both these disappearing elements has been taken principally by silver certificates, these being the only kind of new paper circulation of denominations under $20 available. For amounts of $20 and over, gold certificates have been equally available with silver, and have been taken out to answer the purpose of settling bank balances and for the larger requirements of commerce.

It must be admitted that the effects of the Silver Coinage Act, where so many unknown elements entered into the problem, were of a kind that could not be accurately foretold. If the fears of its opponents have not been realized, those of the bimetallists have been likewise falsified. The latter predicted dire calamities to the civilized world if gold should remain the single standard of value. Gold has remained the single standard both in Europe and in the United States. Not one step has been taken towards bimetallism in any country, nor is there now the smallest probability that any will be taken. Yet commerce and society have advanced with no less prosperous strides since 1873, when the German demonetization, which was for all practical purposes the European demonetization, of silver took place. So far as predictions go, there is nothing to be claimed in favor of the bimetallists, or of the silver men, pure and simple, who have not ranged themselves with the bimetallists. Some things, however, have been proved by the course of events. One is, that any silver coined under our law not wanted for trade purposes will pile itself up in the Treasury a dead weight, constituting an abstraction of so much capital from the business of the country. Another is, that any vacuum happening in the circulation by reason of the withdrawal of older forms of currency, or through the settlement and cultivation of new territory, or in any other way, will be filled for the most part by silver certificates. Still another, and the most important of all, is, that an excess of silver coinage does not change the standard of value from gold to silver, has not yet done so, and does not show any sign that it will do so hereafter.

A well-known banking firm in Wall Street have issued a circular recommending the policy of bond purchases by the Treasury as the most economical means of getting rid of the surplus, and relieving any stringency in the money market caused by the excess of revenue over current expenditures. The circular assumes, and rightly, too, that if a 4½ per cent. bond, having still four and a quarter years to run, is bought, there is a saving of 6 per cent. to the Government, even though a premium of 13⅛ per cent. is paid for it. The same rule holds good as to the 4 per cents, which have twenty years to run. There is a much greater saving in that case. In fact, the Government could afford to pay a much higher premium than the 4's sell for and still save money by the operation, and this for the reason that the Government, unlike an individual, has no other use for its surplus money than to pay its debts. A business man who has a debt falling due some years hence, can invest his funds in many ways so as to make interest equal to the interest he must pay. The Government can do nothing of the kind. Its total liability on a 4 per cent. bond is the par value of the bond plus 4 per cent. for twenty years, i. e., 80 per cent. Each $100 of that class of indebtedness calls for $180. This is the bill that the taxpayers have to foot, and the question is whether they had best foot it now by paying say $130, or let it drag along and pay $180 eventually. This raises the question whether the interest money (the $80) will "fructify in the pockets of the people" during the twenty years, if left there instead of being taken in the form of taxes to cancel the debt in advance of its maturity. The opinion of the wisest thinkers on this subject is that the best and surest fructification of interest on the public debt is attained by paying the principal as soon as practicable, and stopping the interest altogether.

The Financial Chronicle, on the other hand, holds that although the purchase of bonds at a premium is authorized by law, and therefore the Secretary of the Treasury would be protected in buying "at rates not exceeding that of the current market," yet the law was passed at a time and under circumstances so different from the present that it would be imprudent for the Secretary to resort to that power except under very great stress; and that it will be much wiser to wait until Congress shall have had opportunity to pronounce upon the question in the light of existing facts, using meanwhile other and undoubted means for getting rid of the surplus—as, for instance, paying interest in advance for a whole year if need be. We think that the Chronicle's advice is most judicious. It would be highly inexpedient, in a political sense, to buy bonds at a premium in the short interval that remains before the meeting of Congress. It is impossible to say what view the public would take of such purchases. It is certain that if the Secretary were to appear in the market as a buyer, the premium would advance. The bond market is virtually cornered. The amount outstanding is a fixed quantity. Any large and regular buyer whose wants were known would find the price rising upon him at a rate quite irrespective of the value of money. The article would acquire a scarcity value, and the charge would be made that the Government's policy had been adopted to put money into the pockets of the bondholders and bond brokers—a charge that it would be as impossible to refute as it is to prove a negative. We should therefore concur decidedly with the Chronicle in the opinion that, pending the decision of Congress, almost any course would be preferable to bond purchases by the Treasury.

The bricklayers' strike in Chicago, which was simply a continuation or extension of the carpenters' and hod-carriers' strike, and began on the 30th of April, has proved a dead failure, and been declared "off." The master-masons met the strike by the formation of a union of their own, and the publication of a set of "principles" to which all men employed by them hereafter would have to be bound, and which would have the effect of freeing them from the interference of the trades-union in the management of their business. The members of the Union have not given in their adhesion to the principles, but they have formally abandoned the strike and left every man free to do as he pleases about obtaining work. It is calculated that the three strikes which have in succession lasted since April 4, have caused a loss in wages of nearly $2,500,000, besides the transfer of much capital from Chicago to other cities.

We presume it would be no exaggeration to put down the total loss to laborers alone caused by the strikes of the last year and a half in various parts of the country at $10,000,000. They were for the most part due to the extravagant expectations excited among workingmen all over the country by the appearance of Powderly on the scene with his organization of "Knights." The organization had been in existence several years, but it received a sudden extension in 1885, and obtained great publicity by the promise it seemed to hold out to the laboring classes of a new weapon in the shape of a "general strike"—that is, a strike of all trades, or of several, in sympathy with each one. This literally made the Master Workman and the Walking Delegates drunk with the pride of power. It seemed to them as if they had only to snap their fingers to bring the whole community to its knees by a general suspension of trade and traffic. Many of the clergy and professors, too, in various parts of the country were panic-stricken, and began to shout to "Society" and the capitalists that their hour had come, and that they must run for shelter. We then had the Southwestern railroad strike, and the street-railroad strikes, the 'longshoremen's and coalheavers' strikes in rapid succession in and around this city. They all ended in the same way — that is, in immense loss to all concerned. But probably the Powderly bubble could not have been pricked at less cost. Nothing is more certain than that no community can have in its midst a great mass of ignorance and credulity without paying for it smartly in cash.

It is not clear just how much the "revolution" which has been brought about in the management of District Assembly 49 will change the methods of that curious body of Labor. Quinn, the leader in the Old Dominion and other strikes, has been deposed, and Dunn, the leader in the silversmiths' strike, reigns in his stead. Both men are about as unworthy specimens of the free American workingman as could be found anywhere. Dunn is by trade an engineer, but he has done no labor with his hands since he became an active Knight and an arbitrator. He confessed upon the witness stand, in the silversmith inquiry, that it was his custom to lie freely in the cause of Labor, and to advise every other Knight to do the same. His theory of the boycott, also frankly avowed, was to use it as a means of levying blackmail upon employers. He and Quinn were unable to get along together because of the unwillingness of each to yield to the other's orders. It is said by many that Quinn and his associates have made free use of the Assembly's funds, and if Dunn's triumph enables the truth upon this point to be revealed, there will be one good result of his election.

The Anti-Poverty Society has now got so far on in its work of abolishing poverty that it takes up two collections at its weekly meetings. When the baskets had been passed on Sunday night and the receipts counted, Mr. George announced that there was not enough to pay "current expenses," and the baskets were sent through the audience again. Whether "current expenses" were satisfied at the second round, we are not informed. As the Society advances in its work, we presume the number of collections will increase until each poverty abolisher is asked to empty his pockets as he leaves the hall. While this process may abolish the poverty of those who are incurring the "current expenses," it is difficult to see how the humble members of the Society, who have paid their initiatory dollar as the cost of having their poverty removed, are getting ahead. Their enthusiasm at the weekly meetings is said to be as tremendous as ever, but the constantly growing number of collections must inevitably damp it sooner or later.

"Poor old Uncle Jake Sharp," as he called himself in one of his numerous sojourns at Albany, is in a querulous state in reference to his imprisonment in Ludlow Street Jail, and has written a letter to the newspapers on the subject. It is certainly a time calling for the exercise of philosophy, and it happens that philosophy supplies an example and a precept which fit the case of any innocent man unjustly locked up in prison. When Socrates was incarcerated on false charges, his friends urged him to break jail and clear out, but the old man gently chided them for their advice, and improved the occasion to give a discourse on the theory and uses of government. When we entered into the social state, he said, we agreed to obey the laws. Disobedience of the laws is a bad thing. Whether it is a bad thing for me to be in jail, or even to drink hemlock, are matters of doubt and uncertainty, but it is no matter of doubt and uncertainty that jail-breaking is wrong. Shall we do what we know to be wrong in order to avoid something that we have no positive opinion about, one way or the other? There are many other things that Mr. Sharp may find in this case of false imprisonment that may strengthen an innocent man even while riding in the Sheriff's carriage to and from Ludlow Street.

As Sharp's testimony before the Senate Committee has now been admitted as evidence, it is not improper to recall some of the answers which he made to the repeated attempts of Mr. Conkling and others to ascertain what he did with his bonds and money. The total amount which he said he "diffused generally" during the period in question was $2,500,000 in bonds and $500,000 in money. He was unable to remember what he did with $239,000 worth of bonds and $875,000 in money, derived mainly from the sale of bonds. He had made no entries upon the stubs of his check-book for twenty years. He had drawn checks for $74,000, $155,000, $260,000, $65,000, and other such sums, all in one day, and he was totally unable to remember to whom they were made payable. When Mr. Conkling asked, "You diffuse your checks generally?" Sharp replied, "Yes, that is the true statement of the way that I have done this thing for years and years." When Mr. Conkling asked to whom he diffused them, Sharp's answer was, "I don't know; look at that check-book," the book in question consisting entirely of blank stubs. When Mr. Conkling said, "I don't believe I shall ever know what you did with the checks," Sharp replied, "I don't believe you ever will either." At another time he said, "It seems to me that this Committee is entirely out of its sphere in trying to see whether the Aldermen were bribed." In regard to Moloney, when he was asked if he knew him, Sharp replied, in answer to a series of questions, "Billy Moloney? Yes, I know him. I've known him for years. I have met him at the office of Scribner & Bright. I can't say how many times. I don't know how he came or how he went. I may have seen him there ten times."

Governor Hill's disposal of the remainder of the bills left in his hands is, like his action in most things, a mixture of bad and good. His approval of the Subway Bill, we think, gives general satisfaction, as its failure would have postponed indefinitely the putting of the wires under ground, and would have involved the city in protracted litigation. The bill is the one agreed on by all parties as suitable and safe early in the spring, except that the Comptroller and Commissioner of Public Works have been excluded from the Commission, and only the Mayor left on it to represent the city. This is very unfortunate, but what better could one expect from such a body as the late Legislature? and what likelihood was there of doing any better next year? As long as we are under Albany rule, most city improvements will have to be made with unsatisfactory machinery. It is to be presumed that the work of the Commission will now be promptly done, and Mayor Hewitt has the power, at all events, of sounding the alarm if anything goes wrong.

The Governor has made the bicyclists happy by signing their bill forbidding the Park Commission to discriminate against them, and they offer to minimize the evil by coöperating with the Commission in drawing up new rules. Unhappily, however, the public did not intend and does not wish the bicyclists, respectable as they may be, to take a share in the government of the parks, which is apparently what they think this Bill enables them to do. It wishes park rules to be drawn by Park Commissioners, and to be such as commend themselves to the judgment, not of wheelmen, but of municipal officers. The force of this objection to this legislation we think the wheelmen do not yet fully appreciate. The Bill is another blow struck at municipal independence by a body of incompetent and corrupt country legislators, and all we get in compensation for it is the admission of a few score of young men on wheels to the east drive. The vetoing of the zoölogical garden scheme is a public service; that of the National Guard parade-ground was a foregone conclusion. Gov. Hill has signed the bill giving the taxes back to the insurance companies, but without giving reasons, and his silence, we think, was, on the whole, judicious. The bill is one of those things which may possibly be justifiable, but which would take enormous talent and endless pains to justify.

The Governor has, in his memorandum attached to the Five-Gallon Bill, furnished a number of points which will be very useful to those who draft anti-liquor legislation next winter, and we trust they will make a note of them and act on them, whether their aim be to put him in "a hole" or restrict the liquor traffic. He advocates local option in its broadest sense, with regard both to the sale of liquors in bulk and at retail; the payment of all liquor-license fees or taxes into the local treasuries; the fixing of the minimum license fee by the Legislature, and the maximum by the local authorities. It does not appear from this why he objected to the High-License Bill, because if the Legislature is competent to fix the minimum, it is competent to fix the maximum, or if the judgment of the local authorities is good enough for one, it is good enough for the other. One of his objections to the Crosby bill was that it made the fee higher for some places than for others. But why not, if the Legislature knows what the lowest fee ought to be for all places?

The persistence of the belief that anybody can draw as a lecturer in this country was curiously illustrated by the attempt of the English "Claimant" to make a living on the platform a year or two ago. The man, Tanner, who fasted forty days tried it, with no better success. Sergeant Ballantyne tried it also, and was astounded by the smallness of his audiences, and intimated freely that somebody had lied to him grossly about the American appetite for this species of entertainment. Some of the noted robbers of the West have also figured on the platform with more or less attractiveness. It is, in fact, a great resource of everybody who has for any reason become notorious and is "down on his luck." The latest candidate for public attention in this field is Cutting, the Texan editor whom the Mexicans locked up. He is here, it is said, ready to lecture, with stereoptical views of his "dungeon." If he makes money, he is to go back to El Paso, start his paper again, and make the Mexicans howl. The dungeon appears to be chiefly remarkable for having contained Cutting for two months. One view will hardly illustrate it sufficiently, and we presume the pictures will show Cutting in it at various periods of the day.

Nothing probably does so much to damage the Irish cause abroad as the way its defenders thrust it on the attention of indifferent bystanders. Nothing can be more ill-advised and better calculated to excite hostility and disgust than attempts to compel Americans to take sides in it, whether they wish to or not, on their own soil. Nothing has done more to alienate or repel public sympathy with Irish wrongs in this country. It is as ridiculous to insist on people's sympathizing with you as to insist on their loving you. It was, therefore, most injudicious, as well as absurd, for some Irishmen in this city to raise a row in 1883 because the Brooklyn Bridge was opened on the Queen's birthday. It was absurd, too, besides being criminal, to get up a riot in Boston because Englishmen were allowed to hire Faneuil Hall to celebrate the Queen's jubilee. Such things make the very name of everything Irish, including home rule, detestable in the ears of tens of thousands of Americans. How can people expect to be considered rational and fit for any kind of rule who expect all mankind to hate Queen Victoria and the British nation because a large body of Irishmen hate them? Of course every American who is bothered in this way, asks himself what have Irishmen done for him that he should groan over their woes or help to do their cursing. It seems sometimes as if there was nothing the Irish cause needed so much on this side of the water as common sense, because from common sense comes a reasonable regard for the comfort and convenience of one's neighbors.

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S NEWS.

DOMESTIC.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND has accepted the dedication to him of the eulogy on Henry Ward Beecher by the Rev. Dr. Parker of London. In his letter the President wrote of Mr. Beecher as "my loved and honored friend."

Near Bluff City, Utah, a party of five Navajo Indians recently went to the trading post of A. M. Barton and murdered him with great cruelty. For six months a band of desperadoes near Albuquerque, N. M., have murdered police officers, wrecked trains, broken into houses, and stolen horses; and the citizens have organized a vigilance committee to rid the country of them.

Gen. Miles sent a despatch from San Carlos, Ariz., June 26, saying that the hostile Apaches had been driven back to the reservation, that they had surrendered, and that he had instituted an investigation, and detailed a general court-martial for the trial of the three guilty of military offences, "thus ending the present disturbances."

Up to June 28 forty-three cases of yellow fever had been reported at Key West, Fla., and nineteen patients had died.

Five thousand acres of grain and garden crops have been destroyed by grasshoppers near Pernam, Minn.

The steel stern-post for the United States cruiser Charleston was successfully cast at San Francisco June 22. It is twenty-two feet long on the keel with an upright of twenty feet, and weighs more than 15,000 pounds.

The transpacific steamship line from Vancouver has caused a reduction in fares from San Francisco to Hong-Kong and Yokohama to $200. Round trip passage is sold for $350.

Gov. Hill of this State has signed a bill prohibiting the sale of liquors in quantities of five gallons or upwards in those cities, towns, or villages wherein the local authorities do not grant a single retail license, and a bill requiring the licensing and registering of physicians, and he has vetoed a bill to tax "bucket-shops."

The General Term of the Supreme Court in New York has rendered a decision reversing the recent decision of a lower court, whereby it was declared unlawful for hotel keepers in this city to serve wine to their guests on Sunday.

At a public meeting at Rochester, N. Y., June 27, it was resolved to have the city rid of a number of Italians who live in such squalor as to endanger the public health.

Foreign laborers employed by building contractors at Rochester struck June 27, and became so riotous that one was fatally wounded by the police. On June 28, the three large cotton mills at Manville, R. I., were shut down on account of a strike by the weavers, and 2,000 persons were thrown out of employment.

In the trial of Jacob Sharp in this city for bribing Aldermen in 1884 to grant him the Broadway Railroad franchise, the time was consumed until Monday by the prosecution; then the defence was begun. Because of a suspicion that the prisoner might try to make his escape, he has been confined in jail.

The failure of the Fidelity Bank at Cincinnati, in consequence of the recent wheat panic in Chicago, led to the discovery that its business was improperly conducted. Its officers have been arrested, charged with conspiracy to defraud and with transmitting to the Comptroller of the Currency a false and fraudulent report of the bank's condition.

Mr. John R. Buchtel, the founder of the college at Akron, O., that bears his name, has given $175,000 to its endowment fund. He had previously given $125,000.

The last Indiana Legislature made an appropriation to enclose the Tippecanoe battle-ground, where the Prophet and his Indian horde were defeated by Gen. William H. Harrison in 1811, and the Commissioners of Tippecanoe County have ordered the work to be done under their supervision.

The Bricklayers' Union of Chicago on June 23 withdrew the demand for a Saturday pay-day, and declared the long strike ended. As a result of this fruitless strike, miners were idle in Pennsylvania, sawmills and their operatives in Michigan and Wisconsin, and thousands of men thrown out of work in the stone quarries; the pressed-brick trade was affected all over the United States; thousands of dollars were lost to the railroad companies, and every branch of manufacture identified in any way with the building trades suffered directly. An estimate of the loss in wages to striking and locked-out employees in the vicinity of Chicago is $2,500,000.

The Rev. Dr. McGlynn, the deposed priest who is lecturing for the advancement of the doctrine of the communal ownership of land, declared at Chicago, June 27, that he intended to join the Knights of Labor, and to give what time he could to the building up of that organization.

On July 26 a fire in the stockyards at Chicago caused a loss of more than $800,000, and many hogs were burned to death.

The whole town of Marshfield, Wis., was burned June 27; 2,000 people were made homeless, and the loss of property was not less than $3,000,000. A locomotive spark started the fire in a lumber-yard. A large part of the mining town of Hurley, Wis., was burned June 28. The loss is about $80,000.

A boat that was going to rescue the passengers of the steamer Champlain, which was burned off Charlevoix, Mich., a few days ago, met a woman swimming shoreward with a child which she held by its clothing in her teeth. When the captain of the rescuing boat offered to take her on board she told him to hurry to the others, as she could take care of herself. She reached the shore in safety, and when another of the shipwrecked passengers was taken from the boat in an almost frozen condition, she took off her flannel underskirt and wrapped it around him. Her name is Miss Mary Wakefield, and she lives at Charlevoix.

Charles W. Owens, Isaiah Waters, John Brandau, John B. Sanner, and William J. Byrne, in Baltimore, were sentenced June 27, each to two years' imprisonment, and James H. Hamlin to two years in jail and to pay a fine of $1,000, having been convicted of fraud in the last municipal election. They were clerks and judges of election.

Natural gas has been discovered at Fort Scott, Kan., which flows in sufficient volume for use as fuel in manufacturing establishments. The recent discovery of gas at Paola, Kan., was made the occasion of a popular celebration on June 28.

While boring an artesian well near Fort Worth, Tex., June 24, men struck petroleum at a depth of 240 feet.

A severe wind storm in Gregg County, Tex., on Sunday night killed five men, one woman, and two children, and did much damage to property.

At Morehead, Rowan County, Kentucky, May 22, a sheriff's posse shot to death the outlaw and murderer, Craig Tolliver, and his two brothers, Jay and Budd Tolliver. Three weeks ago Tolliver, who had had himself elected a justice of the peace, issued warrants for two brothers, W. H. and John B. Logan, members of the opposing faction, placed the young men under arrest, and had them shot. These were the last of the long series of murders that were caused by the "feud," and there had for three years been an intermittent war in Rowan County. When the posse surrounded the town a battle ensued, but only one of the attacking party was injured.

The Knights of Labor have approved the new Constitution which was submitted to the subordinate assemblies by the general officers. One new provision is, that "no local or other assembly or member shall directly or indirectly give, sell, or have any ale, beer, or intoxicating liquors of any kind, at any meeting, party, sociable, ball, picnic, or entertainment whatever appertaining to the order." Any member found guilty of violating this clause shall be suspended not less than six months, or expelled. The section on coöperation provides for the creation and disbursement of a fund to aid coöperative enterprises. Each local assembly is required to collect and deposit not less than two cents per month for every member in good standing. The money is to be invested by the Coöperative Board, and profits are to be divided equally between the General Assembly, the coöperative fund, and the workmen who create the profit.

Caveats have been filed at Washington on an instrument whereby it is said a manuscript can be duplicated instantaneously several hundred miles away. It is called the graphophone, and a graphophone company has been organized under the laws of West Virginia.

This has been commencement week at most of the foremost colleges, and there have been a number of semi-centennial celebrations—one of the graduating class of '37 at Yale, another of the Alpha Delta Phi Fraternity at Amherst, and another of the founding of the University of Michigan. Six young women were graduated from the Harvard Annex, which during the year has had seventy-five students.

In the Eastern Yacht Club regatta, off Marblehead, Mass., June 22, the Mayflower crossed the line nearly seventeen minutes ahead of the Galatea.

The Yale University crew won the race at New London, Conn., June 24, over the University of Pennsylvania crew by four lengths. Harvard won the boat-race at New London June 27, over Columbia. Time—Harvard 20:15, Columbia 20:25.

The Boston Daily Advertiser has been sold. Under the new ownership it will remain a Republican and protectionist paper.

Prof. V. Botta of this city has received from the King of Italy, in recognition of his late publication, 'An Introduction to the Study of Dante,' a copy of the magnificent edition of the 'Divina Commedia' which the King recently had printed for private circulation. Besides the text of the poem, the edition contains a commentary of the fifteenth century in Latin, illustrating almost every verse of the 'Divine Comedy,' which had remained a manuscript almost unknown among the treasures of the Royal Library in Turin.

Among the notable persons who died during the week were Mrs. Sarah Sophia Cowen, one of the organizers of the Soldiers' Aid Society of Hartford, June 24; Freeman Clark of Rochester, a business man of wide influence, who had been a member of Congress and was Comptroller of the Currency under President Lincoln, June 24; Gen. James Speed of Kentucky, who was Lincoln's Attorney-General, June 25.

FOREIGN.

Jubilee festivities have not yet ended in London, and will not for a week or more. The Queen is entertaining guests at Windsor. United States Consul-General Waller presided at a Jubilee dinner given by the foreign consuls, at which 200 persons were present, including representatives of forty nations.

Prince Albert Victor and Prince George of Wales, who went to Dublin June 27 to attend the Jubilee celebration there, were received with enthusiasm by one part of the population and with hisses by the other part.

The Jubilee yacht race around Great Britain was won by the Genesta, which sailed the distance in 12 days 16 hours and 55 minutes, arriving June 27. On June 25 the yachts Thistle, which will race for the America's cup, and Irex started from Rothesay on a fifty-mile race, and the Thistle won, covering the course in 4 hours 6 minutes and 45 seconds. The time of the Irex was 4 hours 18 minutes and 45 seconds. On June 27 another race was sailed by the same yachts over the Northern Yacht Club course, and the Thistle again won, covering the course in 4 hours 9 minutes and 40 seconds, the Irex's time being 4 hours 17 minutes and 46 seconds.

Among the peers to be created in the distribution of Jubilee honors, the following have been announced: Sir John St. Aubyn, a Liberal Unionist, member of Parliament for the St. Ives Division of Cornwall; Mr. Henry William Eaton, a Conservative, member of Parliament for Coventry; and Mr. Edward Fellowes, a contributor to the Conservative electoral fund, and formerly member of Parliament for Huntingdon. Baron Londesborough will be made an earl. The Earl of Strathmore, now a Scotch representative peer, and Viscount Galway, an Irish peer, will be made peers of the United Kingdom. Baronetcies will be conferred upon thirteen persons, including Sir Algernon Borthwick, editor and proprietor of the London Morning Post; Mr. Moon, Chairman of the London and Northwestern Railway; and Mr. William Pearce, the shipbuilder, member of Parliament for Govan. Thirty-three persons will be made knights, and a long list of decorations conferred on the royal visitors.

Mr. Smith, the Government leader, announced in the House of Commons on June 27 that the Government intended to proceed with the Crimes Bill until it passed the report stage. Mr. Morley moved that the duration of the act be limited to three years. It was the first time, he pointed out, that any Government had the shameful courage to propose perpetual coercion. In any exceptional mutilation of civil rights, particularly in so grave and serious a mutilation as this bill contemplated, the Government ought to be compelled from time to time to examine whether the circumstances still justified the existence of such exceptional legislation. This was the first Government that had cast to the winds the old fashioned regard for the liberty of the subject, and the doctrine that exceptional legislation should not last one day longer than circumstances demanded. Mr. Gladstone urged that the special character of the bill was a reason for limiting its duration. Its enactment as a permanent measure would aggravate existing evils, and intensify that alienation and estrangement from the law wherein lay the fundamental evil of Ireland's social condition. But Mr. Morley's amendment was rejected by a vote of 180 to 119.

June 28 Mr. Smith announced in the House of Commons that on June 30 he would move that at seven o'clock on the evening of July 4 the remaining resolutions on the report stage of the Coercion Bill be put seriatim without debate.

Sir George O. Trevelyan published a letter June 28 about the statement recently made by Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, that the only obstacle to a reunion in the Liberal party was the refusal of the Gladstonians to make any concessions in their Irish programme. He pointed out that the Gladstonians have made concessions on all the disputed points, and therefore interpose no obstacle to a reunion of the party. "The Liberal-Unionists," he concludes, "will be unable to destroy the Liberals, but a reunion of the Liberal party would serve to moderate its policy."

The Irish National League are preparing to meet coercion by establishing branches throughout England and new and larger headquarters in London, in anticipation of the suppression of the organization in Ireland.

William M. Murphy, a Nationalist member of Parliament, while sailing in his yacht in Bantry Bay with a party of friends on June 22, hoisted a green flag. The captain of H. M. S. Shannon sent a party of marines who hauled down the flag and carried it off. The Mayor of Cork hoisted a black flag on the occasion of the Jubilee, and the divisional magistrate superseded him and ordered that only a resident paid magistrate shall try prisoners. United Ireland, William O'Brien's paper, said in its first issue after the Jubilee celebration in London: "Ireland is the only civilized country in the world which did not share in the Jubilee celebration. She stood sternly and sorrowfully aloof. . . . England is cumbered by the struggles of a sullen captive, when she might purchase by justice the aid and comfort of a friend." Frank Hugh O'Donnell, formerly member of Parliament and ex-Vice-President of the Home Rule Confederation, has brought suit against the London Times for libel, in its comment on his recent letter of correction. It is expected that the Times's articles on "Parnellism and Crime" will be brought into court during the trial.

The royal British commission appointed to inquire into the Pasteur system of inoculation for hydrophobia has completed its report, which, in the main, is favorable.

There continues to be trouble at Constantinople over the ratification of the Anglo-Turkish Treaty about Egypt. On June 22 M. Nelidoff and the Count de Montebello, the Russian and French Ambassadors, addressed a note to the Porte which, it was reported (but subsequently denied at Paris), contained a threat that war should ensue should the convention be ratified. Sir Henry Drummond Wolf, the Special English Envoy, declined to modify the terms of the convention. On June 23 a hastily summoned Cabinet meeting was held in London to consider the subject. On June 27 Sir James Ferguson, Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, announced in the House of Commons that Turkey had urgently asked England to consent to a postponement until the 4th of July of the ratification of the convention, and that England had consented.

On June 28, Lord Salisbury in the House of Lords declined to lay the papers relating to the convention upon the table. The Government, he said, had acceded to the delay in signing it, on the definite understanding that the treaty should be ratified by Turkey on July 4 without fail. On the same day it was declared at Paris that England had offered Germany the protectorate of Syria in return for Germany's support of England in the Egyptian question.

Some time ago it was announced that the Pope would send two special messengers to Ireland to make a report to him on the social and political condition of the people. Subsequently it was given out that the plan had been postponed because of a feeling that so active a part in Irish affairs might produce a bad effect. But again on June 28 two Italian priests were ordered by the Pope to proceed to Dublin and to execute the original mission.

Discussion has been continued of the Pope's political ambition. On June 27, it was published at Rome that he had ordered a circular to be prepared instructing Nuncios abroad concerning his attitude on the conciliation question, and that in it he will declare that he will not renounce his right to temporal power in Rome. On the same day Mr. Smith declared in the House of Commons that no proposal to establish diplomatic relations between England and the Vatican had ever been contemplated, nor had any such proposal been made to or by the Government.

At a meeting of the French Patriotic League in Paris June 24, M. Deroulède and M. Sansbœuf delivered harangues against the Leipzig sentences of the Alsatian members of the League. A crowd gathered outside the meeting hall, shouting "Vive Boulanger," "Vive Deroulède," but it was dispersed without trouble. Some importance is attached to his meeting because it is expected that it is only the beginning of a series of demonstrations to disquiet Paris, and frighten President Grévy into either resignation or submission to Gen. Boulanger.

This meeting of the League, and the angry protests that were made against the action of the Leipzig Court, have caused the resignation of many members. Letters have been received from various branches of the League protesting against "throwing France at Boulanger's feet."

Gen. Boulanger has been appointed to the command of the Thirteenth French Army Corps.

The election of the Senate by universal suffrage has been a subject of debate in the French Chamber of Deputies. A motion to that effect was made June 27, and urgency for the motion was moved and rejected by a vote of 317 to 205. The committee appointed to inquire into the position of foreigners in France on the same day rejected a proposal to levy a special tax on them, but a proposal was made that foreigners shall be obliged to declare their domicile, in order to insure identity and subject them to the same taxes as are imposed upon Frenchmen exempt from military service, which is now under consideration.

Mr. McLane, United States Minister to France, has denied that he made other than a personal effort in behalf of Baron de Sellière, who is confined in a lunatic asylum, and who had declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States.

It is announced at Berlin that Austria and Russia will issue no invitations to foreign officers to witness the forthcoming army manœuvres.

Russia has decided to undertake the colossal enterprise of building an Asiatic trunk railway to stretch from Tomsk across Siberia to the Pacific by way of Irkutsk. The work is expected to be completed in five years. By this route the trip from St. Petersburg to the Pacific can be made in fifteen days.

It is reported that the rebellion against the Amir in Afghanistan has failed, and that the Ghilzais are returning to their homes.

A bill has been prepared at Rome, to be presented in the Chamber of Deputies, providing for the preservation of ancient Roman remains in the vicinity of the forum, the baths of Caracalla, and the Via Appia, by means of an archæological promenade enclosing them. The estimated cost of the work is $8,000,000, and the proposition is to pay it in annual rates out of the municipal treasury.

The Lancet, the London medical journal, on June 22 contained the following announcement: "Crown Prince Frederick William of Germany is enjoying excellent health. The appearance of the larynx is quite satisfactory. There is no congestion, but the ventricular bands are slightly relaxed. Solution of perchloride of iron has been applied on several occasions. It is probable that more of the growth will be removed early next week." The German Emperor has regained his usual good health.

King Otto of Bavaria has been officially declared insane. It is thought that an effort will be made at the next session of the Bavarian Parliament to dethrone him.

The Canadian Government recently ordered its custom officials at Windsor, Ont., to make a record of all Americans who daily cross the line to work in Canada; and the United States Collector at Niagara Falls and Suspension Bridge began June 24 to make record of the ages, residence, and occupation of the laborers, about 200 in number, who cross daily from Canada. Notices have been served upon the employers of these men that if they continue to employ foreign labor after July 1, the United States District Attorney will be advised to proceed against them according to law.

REFORM OF OUR JURY SYSTEM.

THE Mayor's action in ordering the Commissioners of Accounts to investigate the management of the office of Commissioner of Jurors will command general approval. We trust that the Bar Association will accept his suggestion of appointing a committee to assist in the inquiry. As the Mayor says, in his letter to the judges of the city courts, the "state of public opinion in regard to the jury system" has made it his duty to order the investigation. It is in no sense a partisan persecution of the Commissioner of Jurors, or of anybody else, but a public spirited effort to find the causes of the glaring defects in the present system and reform them. For this reason the Mayor has done wisely in asking the coöperation of the lawyers and the judges, for the reform is one which they are not only deeply interested in, but are best fitted to bring about.

The evils of the present system were strongly portrayed by Judge Barrett in a recent interview with him, when he said:

"The principal drawback to the present system is, that there is really no system at all. If the dregs of the Directory, supplemented with a limited percentage of good names, had been pitched haphazard into the jury-box, we could not have had anything worse than at present exists. The box is an insult to this great city. It seems to preponderate with a representation of everything that is low, ignorant, vicious, and unintelligent. The panels in these great trials have constantly brought forth a preponderance of illiterate and disqualified jurors. There seems also to be a preponderance of particular interests. Take the retail liquor business as an example. These people are of course entitled to representation in the jury-box the same as all other citizens. But why should they so vastly preponderate? They come to us in every name and guise, as 'liquors,' 'eating-house,' 'importer,' 'wines,' 'lager beer,' 'restaurant,' 'grocer,' 'saloon,' etc."

We have reached this pass by a steady downward course for many years. Each year the office of Commissioner of Jurors has been conducted in a more lax manner than it was the year before. The number of fit men whose names get into the jury-box steadily diminishes, for various reasons, none of which are creditable. It is merely stating what is common knowledge, to say that many pay liberally for their exemption. Undoubtedly the present Commissioner is to some extent the victim of a bad system, but it is the frankly expressed opinion of Judge Barrett and other judges that he has not made such good use of his powers as he might have done. He has governed himself rather by the methods pursued by his predecessors than by the laws upon the statute-book. Anything worse than this system which has been built up by practice it would be difficult to conceive. It puts the decision of questions of the utmost importance, involving even life itself, into the hands of men whom in private life no intelligent person would think of consulting on any subject of moment. As Judge Barrett said: "When it is considered that New York is the greatest city, commercially as well as numerically, in the Union, when her shipping, banking, insurance, and mercantile interests are thought of, it is simply frightful to contemplate controversies growing out of these special and complex matters submitted to such jurors."

The remedy which he suggested is such a complete change of system as would put upon the list all the properly qualified jurors in the city. The tax-books and lists of electors would do for a starting point. Then the membership rolls of the great exchanges and other mercantile organizations could be added. The books of the commercial agencies also could be used. Every large retail establishment in this city has an enormous book in which is set down the name of every regular purchaser of goods, with his record as a good or bad payer of bills, and it is time that the city took some such precaution for its interests as every business man has taken for years. A complete jury census of the city could be taken. Judge Barrett says 30,000 names would be ample to supply all the courts, and certainly this city, with a voting population of 230,000, ought to be able to furnish such a number of upright and intelligent men. The Judge thinks that this would require only five days' service once in two years for each man, and no public-spirited citizen could object to giving that. He thinks, also, that the convenience of business men could be consulted, and they be assigned to service during those months in which they are least occupied.

All this is rational and practicable. It is simply a proposition to apply to the public service the same principles which every business man applies to his affairs, and which, moreover, are absolutely essential to the existence of any reputable business. The trouble with the office of Commissioner of Jurors is the old one which is at the bottom of all our municipal abuses. The office has been "run," not with the object of giving the best possible service to the city, but to make it useful to "politics" first and the city afterwards. The public is at fault, for it has got full as good service as it has demanded. Nobody can deny that the tendency to shirk jury duty is almost universal among the class of men who are best fitted to perform it. The Commissioners of Jurors have taken advantage of this tendency, and, like good politicians as they have been, have used it "for all it was worth." So long as the mass of our respectable and intelligent citizens got off from duty, they did not grumble. The shocking revelations made in these long and almost hopeless searches for even decently fit men to try the "boodle" cases, have aroused a good many of our citizens to the dangerous pass to which their own neglect of duty has brought us, and to this we owe the present strong public feeling in favor of reform. The Mayor has done well, therefore, to order the inquiry at the present time.

A EUROPEAN ZOLLVEREIN.

IN obtaining a modification of the sugar duties and an imperial duty on distilled spirits, Prince Bismarck has secured a new and important support for his policy of making the Empire financially independent of the German States; of raising it from the position of an "importunate creditor" and "burdensome pensioner" of the States to a self-supporting organization. Not that the change is yet complete, for the increasing expenditures of the Empire, principally for war material, still make it in a measure dependent upon loans or upon the subscriptions made by the States to meet whatever deficiency the budget may show; but every new source of revenue for the Empire strengthens its position, and tends to lessen what has been one of the leading causes of friction in the confederation.

What the next step will be it is difficult to forecast, notwithstanding the clear outlines with which Bismarck has defined his general policy. At the end of the last session of the Reichstag the Government asserted its intention of imposing "further duties," an intention that was at the time, and doubtless in future will be, opposed by the Liberals and Progressists. What these further duties will be, and on what classes of commodities they are to be imposed, the Minister of Finance did not disclose; but it is more than probable that they will be internal or of an excise character. For years Prince Bismarck has striven for new spirit and sugar taxes, and for a tobacco monopoly such as is enjoyed with so much profit to themselves by some of the neighboring nations. He has obtained a part of his objects, though not in the form which he proposed; and a tobacco monopoly, certainly a fiscal expedient of no small importance, is yet open to agitation, however great has been the opposition it has encountered in the past

A further consideration leads to the belief that an excise duty will be the form that the Chancellor's financial schemes will assume. The tariff policy of the Empire, though regarded by many as the principal cause of Germany's industrial expansion, is not capable of being resorted to again and again for revenue purposes. Special duties, like those upon grain, cattle, or the proposed duty on wool, may be urged, but their purpose is not revenue, but protection; and it is an old maxim that where protection begins, revenue ends. As it is, the most productive duties from a revenue point of view are those that were not levied with a view to protect home industry, and more than 53 per cent. of the total customs revenue in 1884 was collected from the four commodities, coffee, tobacco, petroleum, and wines. The grain duties supplied nearly one-eighth of the total, a proof that foreign supplies of grain are essential to the support of the German population. True, the average rate of taxation under the German tariff is not very high, when measured by numbers of population; it is about the same as the per-capita tax levied through the customs in Italy, and less than that collected in France. At the same time the rate in Germany has almost doubled since 1879, and there is a strong opposition to further increase.

But, apart from this inelasticity of the German tariff from a revenue point of view, an even greater obstacle stands in the way of an increase of duties, and that is, the adoption of the protective policy by nearly every other State of continental Europe, in imitation of or in retaliation for the German tariff. Italy in 1878 raised her tariff, and thus began the change before the passage of the German law in 1879; but she has recently again modified it in the direction of higher duties. In 1881 France increased import duties by changing the rates from ad-valorem to specific form. Austria-Hungary followed these examples in 1882, Switzerland in 1885, and Rumania in 1886. Each nation is engaged in raising barrier after barrier against the competition of other nations. In 1885 Germany deliberately excluded Belgian linen from her markets, inviting reprisals, which have not yet been determined by the injured country; but in raising the duties on grain she was promptly imitated by Austria-Hungary, whose export of cereals was seriously impaired by the increased charges. And Switzerland, after two years' experience of her new tariff, is overrun by German goods and is seeking new means for removing the pressure of that competition. The duties upon wool, which a party in Germany is advocating, are really levelled against France.

The result of such a conflict of tariffs must be the same as followed a like policy so freely applied under the old mercantile system. Restriction and prohibition generally enforced must react so injuriously upon the manufactures and trade of each nation that means must be sought to remove them and make trade more free, either by the reduction of duties, a concession applying equally to all nations, or by the formation of commercial treaties in which trade privileges are exchanged reciprocally. It was only two years ago that Austria gave evidence that the pressure of hostile tariffs was already becoming unendurable; and Count Károlyi, himself a protectionist, asserted that "the European States, by their present retaliatory tariffs, would in a few years do themselves more hurt than international competition could possibly inflict."

It is by no means improbable that the treaty system will be adopted in preference to a general revision of the tariffs, as by that means there would be no necessity for removing the protection to agriculture which formed the nucleus of the higher rates and served important political ends. Switzerland is offering to enter into such a commercial treaty with Germany, while Austria is seeking to renew upon more favorable terms its agreement with Germany which expires next year, and is conducting negotiations for special commercial advantages with Italy and Rumania. The piercing of the Alps brought Germany into closer trade relations with Italy, and the economic differences of the two countries offer a fair opportunity for mutual advantage under a reciprocity treaty. Is it, after all, so wild a supposition to believe that Prof. Kaufmann's plan of a Zollverein among the nations of central Europe is more than probable? Certainly Germany, as the leading industrial nation of the Continent, would be the largest gainer; but the gains are not to be obtained by increasing the protective features of the German tariff—a step that could only excite hostility on the part of other nations.

Such a commercial union in Europe would have a peculiar significance for the United States. The attitude of Europe towards the export trade of this country has not been, and is not now, friendly. The prohibition of our hog products, the successive additions to the duties on grain and cattle, and the readiness with which any complaint against an American staple is taken up and widely circulated, often in a grossly exaggerated form, are indications of what would be the position of the customs union towards us, could it become an accomplished fact. Nor is it any secret that it was our own tariff that supplied a model to be imitated by Europe, though the most mischievous feature—the duties on raw materials—was discarded. It is by the application of our own methods and instruments that a most telling blow can be struck at our production and commerce. When the "United States of Europe"—the phrase is borrowed from the Kölnische Zeitung—are pitted commercially against the United States of America, perhaps the question "What have we to do with abroad?" will receive more respectful consideration than heretofore.

VACATIONS IN CHURCHES.

This is the season when annually arises the question of clerical vacations, closed churches, the suspension in great measure of evangelizing work; that is, of the most important business, and in the professed belief of those who run away from and abandon it, the only seriously important business of mankind. That the question annually recurs should indicate that it deserves attention; yet if by those most concerned it is never heeded but merely is put by, with perhaps a petulant retort flung over the shoulder of some retreating parson on his way to the mountains or the sea, it may seem hardly worth while to raise it, after all. Still it does press for answer. The inquisitive public does not settle down forgetful, and content with a petulant retort, nor will it cease to be faithless and become believing until some competent person shall explain why it is that the supreme and only really serious business of this world cannot go on in a temperature much over eighty degrees of Fahrenheit.

A good deal of extravagant statement is current on this topic, and not a little unthinking or deliberately unfair comment. An item now going the rounds of the country press says that 126 ministers sailed from New York for Europe on a recent Saturday's steamers. This tale is not confirmed by any facts known to us, and is wholly improbable; still, no doubt, a great many clergymen do go abroad every year, probably more in proportion than of men in any other calling But there are good reasons for this, of which perhaps the first of all is that a vacation is a very good thing and a useful thing, which a man may gladly take when he can fairly get it; then, besides, there are many cases where the sanatory effects of a sea voyage and of diversion really are needed, and the journey serves to repair or confirm or strengthen bodily and mental powers in a manner truly economical. Then some of the clergy may have strictly professional concerns abroad, while some are eminent scholars and preachers, who have a sort of representative function, and whose presence and action in high places in foreign lands do honor and credit to this country and amount to a public service. Besides these particular considerations, there is the general one that, so to speak, the technique of the clerical profession is more uniform than that of other callings, from which it happens that in its exercise one man may serve in place of another more readily and with better effect, and that continuing ministerial work efficiently is in great part a mere matter of "supply." We believe, indeed, that the clerical vacation business is overdone, but we think by no means to the extent which is sometimes pictured, after all fair allowance is made.

This, however, is only the fringe of the matter. The real question is about the cost, and as to that we are clear that no preacher of the Gospel should take a vacation, as many do, at the cost of suspending religious ministrations in his own field. The public instinct is wholly right concerning this. There is, in truth, no reason imaginable, on the ministers' own theory of their existence, for closing up the churches and stopping all offices of religion. Even in cases of repairs which render a building actually uninhabitable for the time, plenty of other places for temporary use may be found. Yet we find in the Mail and Express, under the heading, "Satan Will Be on Hand While the Preachers Are in Europe," a partial list only, in which we count seventeen Protestant churches of New York, including a few of the "low" Episcopal variety (The Incarnation, Zion, and St. Mark's), which are to be closed this summer for periods varying from two weeks to two months. Here are a few examples:

"The Memorial Church will be closed during July and August, while Dr. Robinson takes his vacation in the White Mountains."

"The First Church will be closed until September 18, and the new organ will be placed in position by the Roosevelt Company. Rev. Richard D. Harlan, the pastor, sailed for Europe last Tuesday on the Alaska, and will be gone all summer.'

"The Scotch Church will be closed in July."

"Rutgers Church will be closed during July and August, and Dr. Booth will have two months of vacation."

"The Church of the Covenant will be closed during July and August, while Dr. Vincent is at Bristol, R. I."

We have been led ourselves to consider the subject newly from reading a sort of confession and avoidance published lately in a religious periodical by a Doctor in Divinity—something in advance, and as it were in deprecation, of expected strictures, as we may infer from the remark that "it were very much to be wished that people who are so ready to criticise the churches on this point would bring a little common sense and knowledge of the facts to bear, instead of taking up the hue-and-cry started by newspaper flings." How much of common sense and knowledge of the facts is brought to bear by the writer of that remark may be judged from his employment of the question-begging phrase "deserted, sun-beaten streets of New York in August." "Deserted," with a million and a half of people in them—more than are actually preached to by all our missionary agencies on the face of the globe! The writer says:

"There are churches which ought to be kept open, either because their own congregations largely remain in town, or because they command districts out of which a summer congregation is sure to be gathered. There are other churches where neither of these reasons holds, and where an expenditure of $200 or $300 and preaching of the best quality are met with an attendance of from 60 to 100. I passed a part of last August in the city, and attended service on two successive Sundays in two of our most prominent Presbyterian churches. The days were fair, the preaching excellent, but the congregation in one church was not over a hundred, and in the other and larger church suggested Virgil's familiar line:

Apparent rari nantes in gurgite vasto.

The amount of the matter is, that in many cases, if the pastor did remain at home, he would have principally empty seats to preach to."

Really, on reading this one must stop to ask if there is not in the New Testament an authoritative valuation of a human soul, and whether it is "two or three hundred dollars" for "from sixty to a hundred."

But the clerical writer has reversed the procedure of Balaam, and, being called to bless, he has cursed altogether. For he says immediately:

"In this same summer, however, I had brought home to me, as never before, the justice of a complaint which is urged in connection with the summer exodus, but which is wrongfully bound up with the matter of the minister's vacation. When it was known that I was in town, I was besieged with applications for funeral services, and was impressed with the difficulty of finding any one to officiate. I had not supposed that the city was so stripped of ministers."

Precisely, and there is no answer to this but "repentance and better minds"; all answers in words excite either regret or laughter, according to the temperament of the reader. The writer of the article now under mention, e. g., says:

"The demand for periods of recreation in the case of ministers is peculiar. I am tempted to say that it is greater in their profession than in any other. I confine the discussion here entirely to city pastors. . . .

"I have heard a distinguished New York minister say that if he had only his regular preaching and pastoral work to do, he should feel quite like a man of leisure; and yet most men would consider that work quite sufficient. The city pastor is not allowed to confine himself to his legitimate work. . . . They must dabble in finance, in real estate, in journalism. They must confer on the interests of seminaries and act as examiners of candidates for the ministry. Editors are after them for articles; societies of all kinds for speeches."

No doubt there is something of truth in this, though, to speak of what we may be allowed to know, we have very grave doubts that "Editors are after them for articles." But the point is, that, so far as it is true, it is true of everybody else. What man in full work in New York to-day can "confine himself to his legitimate work"? The foregoing may be called a typical passage, but for a perfect illustration of professional myopia take the following:

"Every one of these men [i. e., men of worldly business] has fifty-two days in each year when business is suspended and he can do what he will. If he choose to keep himself occupied with business on those days, that is his own matter; but he must not plead that folly as a reason why another man should be a fool. Those fifty-two days are a minister's hardest working days, days of strong excitement and great expenditure of nervous energy."

We are obliged to say, in phrase doubly appropriate, "Why, this is very Midsummer madness." Turn the phrase around, and we have, "Every one of the ministers has 313 days in each year when business is suspended and he can do what he will. Those 313 days are a layman's hardest working days," etc. One is as true as the other, and more forcible in proportion to the numbers involved.

At the end of the list of closed churches from which we have quoted we read: "The Roman Catholic churches are of course always open every day. If their priests take any vacation, it is not perceptible in any decrease in the number of services." This well-known truth is a perfect answer to all the evasions of the Protestant brethren. It would be fortunate if the latter could once fully know and feel how their neglect of duty and their feeble excuses for it, their practical insincerity and lack of taking their own professions seriously, affect the public mind, and could be persuaded of the truth of the saying of Dr. Phillips Brooks: "Popular scepticism being what it is, the main method of meeting it must be, not an argument, but a man; the minister, in other words, who deals with unbelief most successfully to-day will not be he who is most skilful in proving truths or disproving errors, but he who is most powerful in strengthening faith in people's lives by the way in which the power of faith is uttered through his own character." If by such means, or by any means, they might learn that religion suffers more, perhaps, from their summer neglect than it gains from their winter labors, it is possible that we should see the end of a grave scandal.

COL. INGERSOLL'S NEW ENGLAND MYSTERY.

THE account given by Col. "Bob" Ingersoll in the Beecher "symposium" memorial volume, just published in Brooklyn, of the conditions under which Henry Ward Beecher was born and brought up, is one of the blackest pictures of life we have ever read. The preacher's birthplace, according to the Colonel, was "a Puritan penitentiary, of which his father was one of the wardens—a prison with very narrow and closely grated windows. Under its walls were the rayless, hopeless, and measureless dungeons of the damned, and on its roof fell the shadow of God's eternal frown." His home was simply "an inquisition in which babes were tutored for the good of their souls," in which "their wills were broken or subdued, their natures deformed and dwarfed, their desires defeated or destroyed, their development arrested or perverted. Life was robbed of its spring, its summer, and autumn. . . . No laughter, no sunshine, no joyous, free, unburdened days." The orthodox Congregationalism of that day, too, was as "heartless and inhuman" as the religion of cannibals. "It despised every natural joy, hated pictures, abhorred statues as lewd and lustful things, execrated music, regarded nature as fallen and corrupt, man as totally depraved, and woman as somewhat worse." All this and a good deal more in the year 1813, in which Henry Ward Beecher was born. And yet, the Colonel admits, in "this atmosphere of theological miasma, in this hideous dream of superstition, in this penitentiary, moral and austere," "the virtues found a welcome cordial and sincere; duty was done as understood; truth was told; self denial was practised for the sake of others, and hearts were good and true, in spite of book and creed."

Now, how is this contradiction, we would ask the Colonel, to be explained? How was it that children who grew up in this infernal state of things cared, by the time they reached manhood, anything about the virtues or tried to practise them? How was it that their hearts were good and true? How was it that, after having had their wills broken or subdued, each generation had will enough left to keep the penitentiary going for their own babes? How, in short, did society keep civilized and decent, while professing this barbarous creed for well-nigh two centuries?

The answer is, we think, very simple. The old New England Congregationalists did not believe with their hearts what they talked with their mouths about the nature and prospects of the human infant, any more than the Colonel believes his own descriptions of the effect of their creed on their lives. There was a monstrous deal of rhetoric in their expositions of the old doctrines, just as there is in the Colonel's account of their homes. Henry Ward Beecher could not have come out of one of these homes, as the Colonel says he did, simply by "getting glimpses through the grated windows of his cell of the outer world of fields and skies." Cause and effect worked in the usual way in the old New England. Animals and plants produced after their kind. Grapes did not grow on thorns or figs on thistles. The old Puritan homes, making allowance for the scanty means and simple lives of people in those days, were very happy except on Sundays. For the principal cloud on them for the infant was not really a theological cloud at all. He was no more in constant dread of being damned than his father was, but he did live in more or less fear of corporal chastisement in his mother's chamber or in the woodshed. But then, owing to the wonderful adaptability of human nature to its environment, the child of 1813 did not suffer mentally from exposure to the rod as a child in our day would. It was the common lot of all his friends and playmates, a daily risk they all ran, and which they got used to, and which did not in the least repress their cheerfulness. That they passed their time in constant dread of God Almighty and Satan, and had their lives saddened thereby, is—we do not mean to be disrespectful—rhetorical gammon.

Undoubtedly there were passages in the lives of a great many New England people in which they were made profoundly unhappy by meditation on their own relations to their Creator as they understood them. But no one can read the journals, or letters, or travels of the end of the last century without seeing that the community was on the whole a happy and cheerful one, whose main sorrow was that the good things of life were so hard to get at. When obtained they were thoroughly enjoyed, although rum probably contributed more to social mirthfulness than we now think desirable. Ministers and deacons drew awful pictures in church of the condition of "the sinner," and of the outlook for him, but they did not allow these views to influence their social or business activity or their treatment of their families, in the way in which the Colonel supposes when the rhetorical fever is upon him. They undoubtedly ought logically to have felt and behaved as he says they did, but then there are and always have been but very few people in the world who are willing to be thoroughly consistent in the government of their lives, and these few are mostly found in Trappist monasteries.

THE FIRST PILGRIMAGE TO CAPRERA.

GENOA, June 7, 1887.

THE originators of the first pilgrimage to Caprera were three silent, deed-doing veterans, all of the Thousand: Missori, who saved Garibaldi in a hand-to-hand fight at Milazzo against desperate odds; Bruzzesi, "present" at every roll-call; Antongini, wounded everywhere, wept for as dead by Garibaldi in the Tyrol, found and restored to health and again foremost on the battlefield of Mentana. Benedetto Cairoli, the last of five brothers—four dead for Italy, he himself maimed—was elected president, but sudden, and it is feared dangerous, illness detains him in Rome. The railway and maritime companies accorded tickets half price, and at midday on the 5th instant three fine vessels of Rubattino's American and Indian line steamed out of the port of Genoa, other two from Civitavecchia, with something like 5,000 pilgrims bound for the Caprera shrine.

The sea was calm as a summer lake, the sky blue and cloudless, the *evviva*s of the populace assembled on the quay following us till Genoa herself grew dim and the eyes of all on deck sought eagerly the belfry tower of Quarto, whence the expedition of the Thousand started on the 5th of May seven and twenty years ago. At eight next morning we sighted the Maddalena; then, on entering the Strait of Moneta, the small White House rose to view. What visions realized, what hopes foregone, returned to memory in the silence that fell upon us all! To my mind returned most specially the evening of October, 1867, when, gazing from the terrace on the Italian fleet that hemmed him in, we arranged the General's flight, one of the most marvellous feats that he ever effected, eluding in his tiny dingy the vigilance of nine men-of war and all the craft of the surrounding islands pressed into service.

The Government having placed barks and steam-tugs at the service of the pilgrims, we landed at Caprera without touching at the Maddalena, on the rough pier of granite blocks built by the General. The steamers from Civitavecchia had arrived before us, and the pilgrims from the south were already ascending the heights by the one tolerable road leading to the bit of level land sheltered by the huge gray granite rocks where the house and garden stand. We, leaving the procession, wound our way through the low copse of cistus in full white bloom, of the myrtle just budding, and so reached the enclosure where Garibaldi lies, his two children, Rosa and Anita, beside him; myrtle and cistus, tamarisks, cedars, firs, and pine trees encircling them. It was only quite late in life that Garibaldi set his mind upon having his body burned. He had always had a horror of being buried in the sea, and when, in a sea-fight against Brazilian foes, most of his comrades lay dead upon the deck, he, prostrate with what he deemed his mortal wound, after giving practical directions to the one able seaman for gaining Santa Fé, whispered to a schoolmate and now a comrade to bury him on shore, to place over his grave—

> "A stone distinguishing my bones from those > Which Death sows infinite in earth and sea."*

From the time he purchased his rocky plot at Caprera, which he had longed for since it served him as a refuge after Anita's death, when Sardinia exiled him, France expelled him, England refused him refuge at Malta, and America gave him his only asylum, he decided to be buried there—indeed, asked formal permission from the Italian Government in 1862. The solitude, the stern wildness, the very barrenness of Caprera was congenial to his nature, a nature that never acted on impulse, though the lightning swiftness of action following upon long-matured designs led people to believe that this was the case. There among those rocks in 1858 he decided to place his republican sword at the service of Victor Emanuel for war against Austria, spent but three days on the Continent to see the King and sound the tocsin, three months remained silent there till in April he could cry, "To arms." So, in the four months that elapsed between the prohibition to pass the Rubicon and the expedition of the Thousand to Marsala, there he planned the attack on Rome which ended on the Bitter Mount, and again that other expedition which ended at Mentana. There he decided "on offering all that was left of him" to France, invaded and nearly annihilated, there he buried his two young daughters and wrote his yet unpublished memoirs—a simple record of facts, having nothing in common with his crude attempts at novel-writing or his declamations against priests and tyrants.

When the first idea of being burned occurred to him I cannot say, but I have always fancied that he took it from Capt. Roberts, a great friend of Byron's, who was with the poet when Shelley was drowned and burned upon the shores of Lerici. I remember once, in 1875 or 1876, telling him about the heretics' cemetery at Rome, and showing him a photograph I had just had taken of the tombs of Keats and Shelley. "Roberts told me all about the burning of Shelley," he said, "but I never asked where they could get wood enough on that barren shore. Perhaps they used the tarred planks of the many wrecks strewed there." I told him the details of the whole proceedings as Trelawny has recorded them, and no more was said. But at the end of 1876, after a long conversation with Dr. Prandina, an old ambulance surgeon who died last year, he wrote with his own hand the following letter:

"My Dear Prandina: You have undertaken the burning of my corpse, and I am very grateful to you. On the road leading from this house northward to the sea, at a distance of about three hundred paces to the left, is a hollow surrounded by a wall. Build up there a pyre two metres square with boughs of acacia, myrtle, lentisk, and other aromatic trees; place on the pyre an iron brand [literally, bedstead]; on this the open bier, and within, my body, adorned with the red shirt. Save a handful of the ashes in any sort of urn, and place it on the tomb which contains the bodies of my daughters, Rosa and Anita.

"Ever yours, G. Garibaldi."

About the same date, in a letter, he writes:

"As I have in my will and testament ordered my body to be burned, I charge my wife to obey my bidding before giving notice to any one of my death."

This, of course, was impossible. Menotti, the eldest son, arrived in time to close his father's eyes; the heart of all Italy beat but for Caprera; none dared to deal with remains so precious in such sudden, simple fashion. Absolute obedience, too, seemed impossible, as the aromatic timber that could be collected was insufficient, and Garibaldi had willed to be burned, pagan fashion, in open bier, with face upturned to sky, not "cremated," shut up in an iron coffin, as the modern fashion has it. The family and friends, deputies and senators, ministers, and a whole army of volunteers, gathered on the island, discussed, protested, pleaded; but Garibaldi, dead, was not obeyed: the remains were embalmed, coffined, and covered with this immense granite block, after four had broken into fragments as though disdainful of their office. But the time will come when the voice of the dead Duce will be obeyed as ever it was in life; his remains will be burned, and above them will tower a massive granite lighthouse for the illumination of mariners and others tossed on life's stormy sea.

Yesterday, by tacit consent, no allusion was made to the vexed question which so convulsed Italy in 1882. Only a few pilgrims wandered northward to the now neglected hollow where the General, who knew himself to be dying, had caused to be collected heaps of aromatic boughs.

At the White House, Teresita greeted us with her father's smile and voice; her husband, Canzio, and Menotti gave the welcome so dear to old comrades, to whom nothing of the past remains save memory. Garibaldi's bedroom is left just as when he died; only his sword of 1860 hangs over it, while in what was once the dining-room are carefully preserved all the commemorative offerings brought or sent during the last five years—a very hecatomb of crowns and garlands, wreaths of fresh flowers, bronze shields, curiously carved medallions, portraits of fallen braves, inscriptions innumerable. All round the house the garden was ablaze with flowers, the scarlet geranium luxuriating in such immense masses that one might imagine an army of red shirts bivouacking there.

From the shadow of a pine tree by the fountain which supplied the General with the sparkling water he liked so well, we watched the grand procession organized as for battle-march defile. At the tomb the flags and banners (and there were hundreds) were all lowered as they passed—some all too new and bright to have seen much good work done, but among these were tatters concealed from the Austrians in Lombardy, from the priests in Rome after 1848 and 1849—flags that had seen the flight of the Austrians from the heights of S. Fermo, at Como and Varese, been carried at a dash up the terraces of Calatafimi, floated over the smoking ruins of Palermo, flashing "victory along all the line" on the Volturno; flags borne triumphantly at Bezecca, on the dismantled fortresses of the Tyrol, only to be lowered at Ponte Cafaro when, to the order of exodus, the General answered, "I obey." There was the flag, too, that had covered the hero wounded on the Bitter Mount, that other that replaced the white and yellow on the turret tower of Monte Rotondo, and, though rifled by French bullets, guided the defeated of Mentana. Then the last but dearest of all, the flag of the Thousand put together on board the Piedmont, the first lowered on Mazzini's tomb by express order of the General, who, on hearing of the death of the Apostle of Unity, said, "Let the flag of the Mille float over the tomb of the grand Italian."

The defiling occupied a couple of hours, twenty bands playing at intervals Garibaldi's hymn, Mameli's war march, or the "Addio, Ninetta, addio," or the sad lament for "Camicia mia, camicia bella." Such a profusion of flowers wrought into love messages never have I beheld. Nice alone sent ten magnificent garlands of living flowers or of immortelles, one having in the centre an alabaster model of the tomb where Garibaldi's mother and Anita sleep—on foreign soil. Too painfully strange it seemed to all to see the French tricolor, draped in black, streaming from the beautiful garland sent by the Ville de Nice. Palermo did her liberator due honor, sending a deputation of six municipal councillors; even so Rome and Naples. The Chamber of Deputies was represented by old Achille Majocchi, amputated at Calatafimi in June, who yet again officered his battalion at S. Maria di Capua in October.

The speeches were few, short, and simple. Majocchi at the tomb insisted on the duty of the people's representatives to complete the moral unity of the country, to whose material unification Garibaldi had consecrated his life. Cavallotti, a favorite soldier and poet of Garibaldi's, spoke from the terrace of the White House for unredeemed Italy, and, wisely avoiding the vexed African question, said: "Our meeting here from every part and province of Italy ought to mean the burial in that tomb of all municipal strife and discord, a hearty reconciliation between Italians to complete the works left unfinished by our dead. This is the only conciliation that Garibaldi's soldiers and mourners understand." The perfect silence that prevailed throughout the day, broken only by the bands and these speeches, preserved the ceremony from any theatrical effect. After every one of the pilgrims had been admitted to visit the memorial rooms, entering to the south and making their exit to the north of the house, all dispersed over the island to collect relics—coral, shells, red granite, sparkling mica, myrtle, lentisk, broom, wild olive branches and cistus, uprooting the entire trees if possible. Nor did Signora Francesca complain, though the gardens were utterly despoiled—despoiled in vandal English fashion, and it is the first time that I have seen such a thing done in Italy. I say, "Donna Francesca permitted it." Garibaldi's three children by Anita (who, by the way, was Garibaldi's lawful wedded wife, nor ever the wife of any other man, as biographers report) resigned all claim to the island, wishing to present it to the country; but, as the youngest boy, Manlio, is a minor, his mother objected, and so the question remains in abeyance until he comes of age. Manlio was not at Caprera, as he is just passing his examination at the military college at Leghora, but sent a magnificent wreath to his father's tomb.

Were I to recount all the incidents and episodes that occurred during the forty-eight hours, my letter would be far too long; but one is worthy of note. On board the Balduino, a large steamer of the Rubattino-American line, the third-class passengers complained of their fare as scanty and savorless, while the table of the first and second class was most amply provided with viands and four sorts of wine. So a vote proposed was carried by acclamation to have but one table in common, the first and second-class passengers contenting themselves with only ordinary wine and two instead of six dishes of meats and vegetables. That trait of Garibaldian equality was a real bit out of the past.

Arriving at Genoa, such of the pilgrims as were not compelled to start by train wound their way up to Mazzini's tomb at Staglieno. Here, with a translation made by an American lady, is Carducci's sonnet, bearing the motto of young Italy, and referring to the actual first meeting which took place between Mazzini and Garibaldi in 1830:

ORA E SEMPRE.

(Davanti il Pantheon.)

"Ora—: e la mano il giovine nizzardo
Biondo con sfavillanti occhi porgea,
E come su la preda un leopardo
Il suo pensiero a l'avvenir correa.

"E sempre—: con la man fiso lo sguardo
L'austero genovese a lui rendea;
E su 'l tumulto eroico il gagliardo
Lume discese di l'eterna idea.
Ne l'aer d'alte visïon sereno
Suona il verbo di fede, e si diffonde
Oltre i regni di morte e di fortuna.

"Ora—dimanda per lo ciel Staglieno,
Sempre—Caprera in mezzo al mar risponde:
Grande su 'l Pantheon vigila la luna.

"Now! And the fair-haired youth of Nice extends
His hand, with flushing cheek and sparkling eyes,
And, like a leopard on the prey it rends,
His thoughts rush on to where the future lies.

"Forever! While his steadfast gaze he bends,
Genoa's austere son accepts that hand;
And on th' heroic tumult of the land
The light of the eternal Thought descends,
And in the heaven of visions high and fair
Resounds the word of faith, and through the sky,
Beyond the realms of death and chance, spreads free.

"Now! Ione Staglieno's tomb calls through the air;
Forever! cries Caprera from the sea.
Over the Pantheon the moon watches high."

GEFFROY'S 'MADAME DE MAINTENON.'

PARIS, June 17, 1887.

M. Geffroy, member of the French Institute, has undertaken a somewhat ungrateful task, not in publishing a critical selection of Mme. de Maintenon's letters, but in preceding it with a long biography, which aims to be a complete apologia of this famous royal favorite. It seems difficult to make a complete edition of the letters of Mme. de Maintenon. It is well known now that the edition issued by La Beaumelle has but little value, and that he completely disfigured the admirable documents which fell into his hands. Mme. de Maintenon destroyed, so it was said by her contemporaries, all her correspondence with Louis XIV., and it must be much regretted that she made this sacrifice, as these letters would have an extraordinary value. M. Lavallée, who undertook to publish all the correspondence of Mme. de Maintenon, found many inedited letters; but his work was interrupted, and his fifth volume, which is very rare, does not go beyond the year 1705. We have in reality nothing on the latter period of the reign of Louis XIV., during which she played such an important part. Of the earlier period we have chiefly mere copies made at Saint-Cyr, and composed of fragments which served for the education of the young ladies in this establishment. It is not impossible that we shall find some day the letters of Mme. de Maintenon to Boufflers, to the princes of the royal family, to the Duke of Burgundy, to the Queen of Spain, to the Duc du Maine. M. Geffroy gives us chiefly her correspondence with her spiritual director, the Abbé Gobelin, her letters to the "dames de Saint-Louis," to the Archbishop of Paris, who became Cardinal de Noailles, to Mme. de Dangeau, to Mme. de Caylus, her long correspondence with the Duc de Noailles, and with Mme. des Ursins.

Mme. de Maintenon has remained to this time a psychological problem: she has her enemies and her friends. Some call her ambitious, others believe her to have been humble and afraid of her own power and influence. Was she an intriguer, a ruling spirit, had she the head and the heart of the greatest statesmen, or was she merely placed by circumstances in the sphere of absolute power, and did she long, in her brilliant Olympus, for a quiet and obscure existence? Was she a victim of her own beauty, of her own wit, of the charms which had made her the favorite and the secret wife of the greatest sovereign of her time; or was she an artful, wicked, cruel, hypocritical woman, determined to establish and to maintain her empire, and to sacrifice everything to her love of power? Was she the cleverest of women, at a time when French society produced so many remarkable women, or had she a common, ordinary intelligence? It has been said that in the seventeenth century the cooks wrote the best of French; her detractors will not even admit any great literary merit in her letters; they pronounce them to be no better than the letters of any other lady of the day. "Adhuc sub judice lis est." M. Geffroy is on the side of the apologists; he is, indeed, the most passionate among those who have dared to take up the defence of Mme. de Maintenon.

Is it necessary to name her enemies? Their name is legion. Who does not remember the burning invectives of the honest Duchess of Orleans, the mother of the Regent? She expressed a real horror for Mme. de Maintenon. What shall we say of the judgment of Saint-Simon, written not for his contemporaries, but for posterity? He speaks of her extraordinary fortune in terms which cannot be forgotten. He tells us how M. and Mme. de Montespan knew Mme. Scarron, at the house of Marshal d'Albret; how, when Mme. de Montespan became the mistress of Louis XIV. and had her first children by him, she proposed to the King to confide them to Mme. Scarron, to whom a house was given for that purpose in the Marais. Afterwards, the children were brought to court and their governess with them. Louis XIV. did not like Mme. Scarron at first, but was induced by Mme. de Montespan to give her the estate of Maintenon. She repaired the old château and became Mme. de Maintenon. Louis XIV. could not understand the great friendship which Mme. de Montespan had for her, and asked several times for her dismissal. He began to change his mind when the governess took the young Duc du Maine to certain spas, and travelled with him to Flanders, to Barèges in the Pyrenees; Louis XIV. read her letters and found them sensible and well written.

Mlle. d'Aubigné cannot be blamed for having married at the age of sixteen the poet Scarron. She had no protector, no fortune. Scarron was to her a friend, not a husband. She became a widow at the age of twenty-five. Scarron had made her acquainted with good society; she cannot well be excused for having consented to become the governess of two children, born of a double adultery. This is, in my eyes, the critical part of her life. She was essentially wrong in accepting the situation which Mme. de Montespan offered her. She professed to be very religious, and speaks constantly in her letters of the charms of conventual life; she would have done much better, if she could not marry again, to enter a convent than to live in equivocal relations with Mme. de Montespan and with her royal lover. Mme. de Sévigné, who had much good sense, knew her as Mme. Scarron, and, as such, liked her. "We take supper every evening with Mme. Scarron. She has a mind amiable and naturally right. It is a pleasure to hear her discuss; . . . her society is delicious." Afterwards, when people began to see the favor of Mme. de Maintenon increase, Mme. de Sévigné writes to her daughter: "I will show you, my dear, a dessous de cartes which will surprise you. This great friendship between Mme. de Montespan and her friend became two years ago a real aversion. It is a bitterness, an antipathy: it is white and then black. And why? Because the friend's pride is in revolt against the other. She does not like to obey. She consents to belong to the father, not to the mother."

Mme. de Montespan's love for the King was a continual tempest. The favorite was proud, ill-tempered, exacting; the King longed for rest. He longed for a quiet, solitary, decent liaison. He could not bear solitude, but he wanted a companion who would be to him what the shadow is to the body. He discovered by degrees, and somewhat to his astonishment at first, that the governess of his illegitimate children could fill his leisure hours noiselessly, pleasantly. She was discreet, reserved, sensible; she could keep a secret like a confessor; she could give advice and not boast of it; she could enter wholly, completely into the occupations, the preoccupations, the anxieties, the emotions of his own life—lose herself, so to speak, completely, and give him the sense of a sort of dual existence. Greatness is solitude; and who was ever as great as the "Grand Roi"? He was naturally sad and needed a companion, an echo. Mme. de Maintenon became this echo.

She was an echo much more than an inspirer. She was not of a despotic and overruling disposition. The pamphleteers and even the historians have made her responsible for many acts and resolutions which were really not her work. In one sense, however, she might be said to be responsible: she acquired a great influence—the influence due to a constant assiduity and to a complete devotion; and she might have used this influence in sometimes resisting and counteracting the royal resolutions. But who knows if the influence we speak of was not due to the complete abdication of her will? When two human beings have lived long together, like Mme. de Maintenon and the King, inseparable, tied together by the strongest of human ties, it becomes very difficult to say which of the two has had more influence in such or such a determination.

When Mme. de Montespan fairly fell into disgrace and was reduced to the honorary post of superintendent of the Queen's household, Mme. de Maintenon was appointed dame d'atour of the Dauphine. She thus became entirely independent of Mme. de Montespan. Her favor soon became apparent; the King entered with her into a new and unknown country, which Mme. de Sévigné calls "la commerce de l'amitié et de la conversation, sans contrainte et sans chicane." The courtiers whispered that Mme. de Maintenon's real name was Mme. de Maintenant. She spent all her evenings with the King, and how did she employ her new favor? First, in converting or trying to convert all the members of her family, who were still Protestants. She stopped at nothing, and employed means which were a sort of anticipation of the methods followed at the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. She sent M. de Villette, who refused to be converted, on a long journey (Mme. de Villette was the favorite daughter of the famous Agrippa d'Aubigné, and an ardent Calvinist), and during his absence she procured the abjuration of his young son, and placed him in a military academy. She also took advantage of the absence of M. de Villette to get possession of Mlle. de Mursay, who became Mme. de Caylus. Mlle. de Mursay left her mother and arrived at Paris with some cousins—young Saint-Hermine, Mlle. de Saint-Hermine, and Mlle de Caumont. "We arrived together in Paris," says Mme. de Caylus in her memoirs. "Mme. de Maintenon came immediately and took me to Saint-Germain. I wept much afterwards; but the next day I found the King's mass so beautiful that I consented to make myself a Catholic, on condition that I should hear mass every day and that I should never be whipped. This was the only controversy employed, and the only abjuration I made." The other cousins, being a little older, resisted a little longer, but finally they all gave in.

These conversions are not a glorious page in the history of Mme. de Maintenon, and her conduct towards the children of M. de Villette lends much probability to the opinion of Saint-Simon, who makes her afterwards chiefly responsible for the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. It is well known that converts are often intolerant, and easily become persecutors. The religious intolerance of Mme. de Maintenon was a sort of self-justification. M. Geffroy tries in vain to upset the theory of Saint-Simon; he finds no good arguments. It is true that in her letters she recommends to her brother, D'Aubigné, tolerance towards the Calvinists in his government, but she applauds constantly after 1685 the destruction of heresy, and even the massacres of the Camisards in Languedoc. In an answer to a memoir written in 1697, 'On the best manner of effecting the conversion of the Huguenots,' she declares that it would be dangerous to recall the Huguenots and to abolish the decrees published after 1685. We do not attach much importance, in this question, to the opinion of Voltaire, who wrote to Formey, on January 17, 1753, "Why do you say that Mme. de Maintenon had much part in the revocation of the Edict of Nantes? She had no part at all in it. This is a certain fact. She never dared to contradict Louis XIV." We may easily believe that she did not often contradict the King; but an artful woman has many ways of bringing her lover to her own opinion. Mme. de Maintenon was artful, though some writers would try to persuade us that she was a simple-minded person. She first used her increasing credit in trying to separate the King from his mistresses, and preached to him virtue and conjugal fidelity. Did she ever really work in the interest of the Queen? Would she have been contented, by the side of the Queen, with the part of a confidante and an adviser? She was older than Maria Theresa, older than Louis XIV.; but in 1680 she was only forty-five years old. She could not foresee that the Queen would die in 1683. She had already become indispensable: she had brought Louis XIV. to the point where he could refuse her nothing. She was married to him secretly, and D'Aubigné, her profligate brother, called Louis XIV. boldly, "my brother-in-law." Saint-Simon pretends that her ambition even then was not satisfied, that she wished to be declared Queen, that Louvois, the Archbishop of Paris, Harlay, Fénelon, the Duc de Beauvilliers, fell into disgrace for having determined the King to refuse her this last favor. M. Geffroy tries to prove the contrary. There are mysteries which are never unravelled. Louis XIV. was weak as a man, but he had a very exalted idea of royalty. He could not live without his Maintenon; he did not wish to present her as the Queen to his own people and to his brother-kings in Europe.

Correspondence.

THE FRENCH FINANCES.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Your issue of May 26, No. 1143, contains an article entitled "The French Crisis," which it is impossible for a Frenchman, and, I may add, for an impartial and well-informed reader, to let pass without a word of protest. Neglecting all minor errors—such as the bold assertion that popular sentiment demands Gen. Boulanger as a necessary member of the Cabinet—I willingly point to that most astonishing phrase: "The shrewdest financial heads in France, in fact, such men as Léon Say and Paul Leroy-Beaulieu, believe that a Treasury collapse of some kind is not far away." I have read with the greatest care for the past five years every book, every article, written by Say and Leroy-Beaulieu. I consider both of them to be clever, patriotic, and sincere men, not afraid to speak harshly when it is necessary to enforce a painful truth on public opinion. Now, I can declare that neither one nor the other ever wrote or spoke a word predicting a Treasury collapse in our country; further, I maintain that Leroy-Beaulieu, the only one who writes regularly in the Économiste Français, has not ceased to repeat that if the state of our Treasury is embarrassing, French finances and French public wealth are very far from being in danger. About six weeks ago Beaulieu, examining the returns of the taxes on donations and legacies, showed how steadily and speedily those taxes have increased for the last twenty years, and came to the conclusion, which is shared by all financial authorities, that the improvement of our finances would be a matter of no difficulty if only peace and interior tranquillity could be maintained. What must Americans think of French statesmen who are accused, without the slightest foundation, of having uttered words of treason such as the foretelling of a financial collapse would be? And what must American readers think of the French public which is mad enough to pay 82 francs for 3 per cent. funds, when those 3 per cents are in danger—according to your writer—of not being paid to-morrow or the day after?

I will not trespass upon your space by trying to give a correct idea of the state of French finances and of the real or unreal embarrassments of our exchequer. But two points I must briefly insist upon, (1) that Gen. Boulanger, whatever may be said against him, has not had the least influence on the French budget and deficit: any Parliament and any Minister of War would have felt the necessity of modifying our rifles when Germany had adopted a similar change in her armament, and this has been the only extraordinary expense for the War Department during the last twelvemonth; (2) that people ought to reflect, before they speak about a possible, nay, a probable, collapse of the French Treasury, on the privileged and exceptional nature of the French public debt. Not only is the debt almost entirely in the hands of Frenchmen, so that the payment of the interest does not make the country a franc poorer, but—and I am afraid many Americans do not know this—all the French railways must become the property of the State a hundred years after their opening to traffic. In fact, as early as 1950 the greater part of our railways will already be State property, thus affording at once the means of repaying, if it be thought necessary, more than half of the public debt. A country which possesses the bare ownership of all the railways built on its soil is not in danger of a "Treasury collapse."—Truly yours,

Salomon Reinach.

Paris, June 5, 1887.

[We were thinking of going over M. Leroy-Beaulieu's articles on French finances in the Économiste Français during the last two or three years for the purpose of showing, by numerous quotations, how rash M. Reinach's assertions are, and how defective his memory is, when we took up the last number, of June 14, containing another discussion of the same subject by the same writer. In it M. Leroy-Beaulieu shows that the public debt of France is per head of population more than one-third greater than that of England, Austria, or Italy, and three times as great as that of Germany, and calls this a low estimate. He winds up by saying: "In spite of all these devices [imperfect statements of liability] of our budget, although we have been constantly taking pains to conceal its real amount by special accounts or occult methods (quoique nous ayons eu une préoccupation constante d'en dissimuler, par des caisses spéciales ou des expédients occultes, la grosseur réelle), it is, nevertheless, plain, from all the testimony, that the French budget largely (d'une façon considérable) surpasses in all its principal features the budgets of the other six great States of Europe. This situation," he adds, "cannot last without, in the long run, seriously affecting the national vitality (sans que la vitalité nationale à la longue en soit profondément atteinte)." It will be seen that this is a far more serious charge than the one we have ascribed to him, of thinking a "Treasury collapse of some kind not far away." If the latter be "words of treason," what must the former be? And let us add that there could not be, to our minds, a stronger illustration of the risky condition of French finances than the fact that a Frenchman of M. Reinach's intelligence thinks it treasonable to express alarm about them. Our assertion about what other "shrewd financial heads" thought of the situation was possibly indiscreet, because it was based on private information, which is—of course, without meaning to reflect in any way on M. Reinach's good faith—more valuable to us than his general denial can possibly be.

As to the condition of popular sentiment about Gen. Boulanger, that is, of course, a matter of opinion about which it is useless to bandy contradictions. All we can say is, that our view of it is shared by hundreds of excellent political observers, both in France and in foreign countries. That Gen. Boulanger himself shares it, may fairly be inferred from the remarkable sentence in his farewell order to the army, in which he called attention to the fact that in going out of office he was "setting an example of both republican and military discipline." The only possible construction at all creditable to his intelligence one can place on this is, that under the circumstances less patriotic men than he might have felt justified in staying in office, even if the President or his colleagues wished him to go.

We may add in conclusion that we did not mean by the phrase "a Treasury collapse of some kind," the total repudiation of the public debt, as M. Reinach seems to imagine. There might be many a collapse damaging to French credit and humiliating to French pride before that pass was reached. In fact, some financiers would call attempts to conceal the real amount of the debt by cooked accounts, such as M. Leroy-Beaulieu describes, a collapse of a very painful nature. But the remedy never can be applied as long as earnest talk about the evil is considered traitorous or even unpatriotic.—Ed. Nation.]

THE QUESTION OF CHURCH UNION.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The only way a Protestant can experience the delights of the doctrine of infallibility is by having an infallible newspaper on which he wholly leans, and in which he heartily believes.

Such has been my belief in the Nation from the time when, as a college boy, I subscribed for it, since which time I have never been without it. When it has ruthlessly criticised my own books as they have appeared one by one, I have fallen back upon the wisdom of Irving's character in 'Sleepy Hollow,' Ichabod Crane, who, when he whipped the boys in his school, invariably remarked that they would thank him for that afternoon's performance the longest day they lived.

I have never addressed a letter to my lifelong friend, the Nation, through all these years until to-day, when, in all deference to the doctrine of editorial infallibility, I venture to suggest two or three fallacies in your editorial of June 9 on "The Question of Church Union."

First of all, no one enlisting in this enterprise of church unity expects that it is going to be a mere matter of ninety days, as Mr. Seward said of the War of the Rebellion. Obstacles are to be encountered; prejudices are to be aroused; the dark shadows of ecclesiastical and theological bias must be awakened. Our Lord said of the religion which he came to establish, "I come not to send peace but a sword." A movement like this drives men back to their definitions, and clearness of thought comes with clearness of definition. Men must ask to day what they mean by the church, and what they mean by church unity. Is it the mediæval idea of hierarchical organization, or the practical American idea of a national Federation?

Secondly, the Congress of Churches has held no meeting this year, simply because already the manufacture of the material of church unity has exceeded the available demand. We do not want to go on talking generalities when we are wide of the vital question before the house. Each church must settle its own details. The Congregationalists are driven back to the question of the authority of their mission work, or the problem of centralization cropping out in their polity. The Episcopal church is divided about the problem of its change of name. The prophetic sword has already pierced the fabric of the past, but peace will come after the sword thrusts of the immediate present.

Thirdly, no meeting of the Congress of Churches was held this year for another reason. It was hoped that something definite and practical could be accomplished in the matter of Christian unity by the churches of our towns and villages meeting together for united service during Holy Week, and especially upon Good Friday. This was accomplished, and now, in addition to the theory of Christian federation, a practical precedent has been established in the matter of keeping the Christian year, which will serve for the second step forward when the time for the next meeting comes.

The chief fallacy of the editorial in the number of June 9, however, consists in this—that, as a matter of fact, it is the town which is the practical centre of Christian unity, and not the city. Churches and ministers are too busy, in their endless routine and in their crowded city life, to stop to see how this problem of unity can become practical. This movement of the Congress of Churches began in the felt needs of town life, and has been carried on by the convictions of many Christian workers who live in country, not city, life. Already in half-a-dozen towns in Massachusetts, steps have been taken towards realizing practical unity by keeping Holy Week as a Christian town—taking as the norm of unity the local church in a place, such as "the church which is in Corinth," or "the church which is in Amherst."

To sum up, then, the points in this case, we may say:

(1) The question of church union means the work of a generation, not the work of a day.

(2) The question of church union drives men back to their definitions, and inevitably draws the sword of discussion first, before peace comes.

(3) The question of church union is one in which we must allow plenty of time and space and charity, and the happening of the unexpected, for the settlement of lesser local details.

(4) As a matter of fact, it is city life, with its endless routine and its lack of bird's-eye view and perspective, which has, up to this point, presented the chief obstacles to the practical realization of Christian unity—not "the sweeping social revolution" which you seem to think would follow were church unity realized in the country.

I write thus as a country minister, and can name several towns in Massachusetts where the effort to realize practical church unity has been tried without incurring any "sweeping social revolution."—Very sincerely yours,

Wm. Wilberforce Newton.

AN IMPORTANT ELEMENT OF MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENT.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: A paragraph in your last number begins with these words: "We doubt if the people of this city realize fully the importance of the experiment which Mayor Hewitt is making in the City Hall." As this goes to the root of one of the strongest of my political hobbies, I ask your indulgence for a moment. If it should appear out of place for me to discuss New York city politics, you will perhaps remember that the experiments in government in every city are of the deepest and most direct interest to all the rest, and that New York is the most central and the most important of all,

New York and Brooklyn have taken a strong lead in the right direction in giving greater power to the Mayor, and especially in taking away from the Aldermen the right of confirming his appointments; and it seems as if the drift of opinion was towards a still further extension of these powers. But while this system offers great advantages with a good Mayor, it involves serious risk with a bad one, and there is danger of losing sight of that which is the safeguard against bad and the encouragement in good use of power—the public enforcement of responsibility. I believe that the government of Brooklyn by Mayor Low was very satisfactory to the best citizens, but the mass of the people knew very little about it; and, perhaps for that very reason, he has a successor who is, I presume, much less satisfactory, while silence, so far as I can learn, has settled over the whole arena.

Perhaps the purest form of government in this country is the New England town-meeting. This may be true of other local governments, but I speak of that which I know best. The town government may sometimes be extravagant and sometimes foolish, but anything like systematic corruption or dishonesty among town officials is extremely rare. The reason is, that the whole responsibility for administration rests with the officials, and mainly with the selectmen. The town meeting assembles once or twice a year, the selectmen and officials being present; and individuals bring forward their grievances and discuss the conduct of their agents in their presence and before the company. The test is so severe that none but honest men can stand it.

When the town becomes so large that the meeting is too cumbrous, relief is sought in the form of the representative council of a city. In theory, this council should do the same thing as the town-meeting—that is, keep the people fully informed of the character and actions of their responsible servants. In practice, the council, by its system of committees, and by excluding the executive officials from its sessions and depriving them of all voice and initiative, gets hold of executive power, breaks up and diffuses responsibility, and carefully covers up not only its own tracks, but those of the executive power. In restoring power to the executive, the true function and power of the council should be kept in view. If a body of one or two hundred men from all New York city were to meet, say once a month, and if the Mayor and the chief officials were to appear before this body in public session; if the body were forbidden by law to interfere with the executive power, but limited to criticism and to the voting of money upon executive proposal—or, in other words, to a veto—then the character and actions of the officials would speedily and fully become known to the whole city, and then for the first time we should have the right to blame the people if things went wrong.

There is a curious symptom of the dim consciousness of this want in the provision which is running the rounds of the various city charters, that the Mayor shall at stated times call the various officials together for consultation. But they may consult just as little or just as much as they please. They are all interested on one side. Their tendency, like that of all officials, even if honest, is not to waste time on the public—to do their work rather than talk about it. It is not at all the same thing as to have a body whose interest lies in seeing that the public are well informed.

SENATOR HOAR OR CITIZEN HOAR.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In the current issue of your paper I have read with great surprise an extract from the address of welcome delivered by Senator Hoar to the R. E. Lee Camp of Confederate Veterans upon their reception at Faneuil Hall. I cannot suppose that you invented or even "edited" the speech, which I therefore assume was delivered,

It is expressed in terse and elegant English, and it expresses the best thought of the time as to the war which "has led to the indissolubility of the American Union and the universality of American freedom."

But suppose this deliverance had been made, not by a Massachusetts Senator who, in his official capacity, gives a pet place in his wardrobe to the bloody shirt, but by a man, of what distinction soever, either in civil council or in loyal military service, who by political affiliation was a Democrat or by non-affiliation was a Mugwump—what then? Would it not have been accounted little short of treason, and would not he have been pilloried as a rebel at heart?

"Is it love the lying's for?" I ask with Hervé Riel; for there is a juggle with the truth somewhere. Is it Senator Hoar or Citizen Hoar, Senator Sherman or Citizen Sherman, who is speaking; or is Mr. Facing both-ways the best American type? JOSEPH PARRISH.

THE FIRE AT THE OPÉRA COMIQUE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In the account of the burning of the Opéra Comique printed on page 462 of your issue of June 2, it is said, ". . . the whole stage was immediately enveloped in flames. The fire soon spread to the rest of the house, although the iron curtain was lowered."

If uncorrected, this statement would tend to spread the belief that an iron curtain affords no protection to the audience of a theatre in which it is used. In fact, no attempt seems to have been made, on the occasion in question, to lower the iron curtain; at any rate, it was not lowered.

AMERICAN ANCESTRY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In consequence of the notices in the Nation, both in December last and more recently in your review of our Albany volume, we are receiving a very large number of communications regarding our work. Will you, therefore, allow us to state through the same widely circulated medium that, while our local series merely publish lineages of persons residing in certain localities, our standard series will publish lineages sent from any part of our United States, and thus place on record for all time the ancestry of any living American whose ancestor resided in America at the time of the Revolution?—Yours respectfully, JOEL MUNSELL'S SONS.

ALBANY, N. Y., June 25, 1887.

Notes.

TICKNOR & CO., Boston, publish immediately 'Penelope's Suitors,' a story of the old Colony days, by Edwin Lassetter Bynner; and 'Home Sanitation: a Manual for Housekeepers,' edited by Ellen H. Richards and Marion Talbot.

Mr. Frank D. Millet, the well-known artist, has translated into English Count Leo Tolstoi's powerful work entitled 'Scenes from the Siege of Sebastopol.' His intimate knowledge of the Russian people and Russian life should be a guarantee of his success in this task. The translation is introduced by a chapter on Tolstoi from the pen of W. D. Howells, and the book, which contains a portrait of the author, will be shortly issued by Harper & Brothers. They announce also 'Horsemanship for Women,' by Mr. Theodore H. Mead, with forty-one illustrations by Gray-Parker.

The Memoirs of the Margravine of Baireuth, eldest daughter of Frederick William I. of Prussia, translated by the Princess Christian, will be published in this country by Scribner & Welford.

The Worthington Co. will be the American publishers of Swinburne's 'Select Poems.'

'The Republic of the Future,' a satirical anti-Socialistic brochure by Mrs. Anna Bowman Dodd, is announced by Cassell & Co.

Prof. Wm. G. Hale's address before the recent meeting of the Classical and High-School Teachers' Association of New England, entitled 'Aims and Methods of Classical Study,' is in the press of Ginn & Co.

A. D. F. Randolph & Co. announce 'The Bible History,' in six volumes, by Alfred Edersheim, D.D., author of 'The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah.' Also, an edition of the 'Memorials of William E. Dodge,' the first edition of which was printed for private distribution.

'The Life and Times of Jesus, as related by Thomas Didymus,' by James Freeman Clarke, just published by Lee & Shepard of Boston, is a reissue of a book which appeared in 1881 with the title 'The Legend of Thomas Didymus, the Jewish Sceptic.' No notice is given in the book of the fact of its having formerly appeared with a different title.

We have already referred to the technical part of Prof. Angelo Heilprin's report on the expedition undertaken by the Wagner Institute of Philadelphia, with the assistance of Mr. Joseph Willcox, to southwest Florida during the winter of 1885–86. The complete report is now issued, with an introduction by Dr. Leidy, a narrative of the journey by Prof. Heilprin, some additional descriptions of new species, and eighteen plates of new fossils, etc., made by an apparently new phototypic and rather murky process called the Levytype. The report will be of much value to all interested in the geology and palæontology of the region, and is creditable alike to the Wagner Institute and to the exertions of Messrs. Heilprin and Willcox.

Mr. W. J. Loftie's literary-historical 'Windsor Castle,' which, after running through the Portfolio, appeared in book form some two years ago, was originally written in a vein of rather effusive "loyalty." To give the book a "Jubilee Edition" was therefore both natural and easy, and this Macmillan & Co. have just done. Bidding good-bye to the Portfolio form, which had been determined by etchings now abandoned, the publishers have chosen a duodecimo of fair dimensions, scarlet-covered, illustrated with numerous cuts in the text, and with a phototype copy of Boehm's sitting statue of the Queen for a frontispiece. The print is large, and the price much below that of the larger edition.

An opposite policy has been pursued by Macmillan & Co. in the case of the "Victoria Edition" of Shakspere's works. Here a smaller, one-volume edition, the "Globe," with the text of W. G. Clark and W. Aldis Wright, has been expanded into three volumes, 12mo—the Comedies in the first, the Histories in the second, and the Tragedies and Poems in the third. A simple binding in green cloth has been given them. The page is in double columns, and the letter-press is clear, if compact. There are no introductions or notes, the "Globe" having had none. The price is wonderfully cheap, and would hardly have been possible before the Victorian era.

We commend, as we have done their predecessors, the latest volumes, xiii to xvi, in the Library Edition of the Waverley Novels (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Co.). They are, in order, 'The Pirate,' 'The Fortunes of Nigel,' 'Peveril of the Peak,' and 'Quentin Durward.' The large and liberal style of this edition makes it very attractive to eyes that admire fine typography, or need to be favored with print that can safely be read by candlelight.

Prof. Franklin B. Dexter's 'Sketch of the History of Yale University' (Henry Holt & Co.) is a thin, neatly-printed volume of about 100 pages, compactly setting forth what needs to be known, in due sequence to the present administration. Those who wish for detail on the earlier periods can find it in Prof. Dexter's 'Biographical Sketches of the Graduates of Yale College,' of which the first volume appeared two years ago and the second is in preparation. Other sources are mentioned in the short bibliography which succeeds the curious statistics that follow the main narrative. What is true of Yale, that the graduates bearing the name of Smith lead in number, with Williamses in the second place, is true also of Harvard and perhaps of some other colleges.

"The Gentleman's Magazine Library, being a classified collection of the chief contents of the Gentleman's Magazine from 1731 to 1868, edited by George Laurence Gomme, F.S.A." (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.), has reached Part 1 of 'Romano-British Remains,' an octavo volume of 297 pages. It contains the accounts of local discoveries in England in the several counties, arranged alphabetically, as far as Somersetshire. The remaining counties of England, together with Wales and Scotland, stations, roads, etc., notes and index, are reserved for Part 2. This most useful compilation is introduced by a discussion by Mr. Gomme, in twenty-one pages, of the character of the Roman occupation of Britain, and the classification of the remains. Mr. Gomme takes issue with Mr. Coote and Mr. Seebohm on the question of the Romans in Britain, holding that their occupation was exclusively military: "that the Roman conquerors found the country occupied by tribes of more or less barbarous people, and they left it with the tribal organization still practically unbroken." This view, arrived at by the examination of classical and other sources of knowledge, appears to him to be sustained by the evidence of archæology. Mr. Seebohm's argument from the fact that "our modern villages are very often on these old Roman, and sometimes probably pre-Roman sites," he holds to be neutralized by the facts that the Saxon cultivator often turned "the site of the Roman villa into arable lands," and "that Roman villas by no means implied Roman villages; that for the instances which Mr. Seebohm advances where continuity in the occupation of one site may be shown by archæology, there are innumerable instances where archæology shows no such continuity."

There comes to us the first number of Spelling, "a magazine devoted to the simplification of English orthografy" (Boston: Library Bureau; London: Trübner & Co.). It is dated May, 1887. "Everything," we read, "that practically concerns spelling, and is wurth printing, wil be welcum to the pages of this periodical. The Spelling Reform Association, whose policy we shal follow, refers all theoretical and scientific alfabetic questions to the experts of the Philological Association. We shal set forth the views of the filologists. Articls in dissent from these views wil be admitted, and wil be answerd." But the main object of this periodical is to popularize the reform. As our extract shows, the (partially) amended orthography is employed.

The June number of the Antiquary contains several interesting papers, but none of special importance, except the conclusion of Prof. Conway's 'Exercitium super Pater noster.' This article gives much interesting information with regard to early printing, and arrives at the conclusion that the book in question was printed before 1440. Of "Old Storied Houses" we have Harvington Hall in Worcestershire; of "London Theatres," Whitefriars. "The Early Custody of Domesday Book," by J. H. Round, is directed against the opinion of Hubert Hall, that this document, from about 1108, was preserved at Westminster; the article is to be continued. Other articles of interest are on Kentish neolithic implements, the Maltese nobility, the earthquake at Lisbon, and the Selden Society.

The Magazine of American History for July prints two of the papers read at the recent sessions of the American Historical Association in Boston. The more important of the two is that of President Winsor, on the "Manuscript Sources of American History—the Conspicuous Collections Extant," an extremely valuable indication for the student, and, we hope it may prove, an incentive to families which still preserve their own archives, of national moment, either to put them in the nation's custody or to insure them against destruction—following the example of the Adamses. Dr. A. B. Hart, instructor in history in Harvard, writes with a light touch the "Biography of a River and Harbor Bill," namely, that of 1887, which the President killed by not signing. This is a useful piece of work, and we wish it might have a circulation beyond the readers of the Magazine.

The relation between the postal rates on books and the sphere of the circulating libraries is not often considered; but the sixty-sixth annual report of the Directors of the Mercantile Library of this city favors the movement, which failed at the last session of Congress, to get a lower rate, inasmuch as it would enable this library to supply a demand for books from parts of the country where no library exists. In the same report we read: "It has been observed that as the number of cheap and poorly printed books multiply, the tastes of our readers become more fastidious and exacting. Books printed before the present glut of cheap literature, the typography of which appeared to be perfectly satisfactory at the time they were issued, are now refused, and editions with more legible texts demanded. As has frequently been the case, these books have not been issued in any other form; therefore it has not been possible for us to comply with the demands of some of our readers."

The twentieth annual report of the Trustees of the Peabody Museum of American Archæology and Ethnology is one of the most interesting of the series, particularly in the minute account, by Prof. Putnam, of the examination of mounds in the valley of the Little Miami River, Ohio, last fall. The Museum is in urgent need of enlargement, the plans for which are already under way.

It seems a little like the introduction of opéra-bouffe into real life when the Hydrographic Office announces, with all seriousness, that two quarts of oil an hour is sufficient to prevent much damage to ships in heavy seas. Mineral oils are said not to be so effective as vegetable or animal. The best result is obtained in deep water; but the use of oil is also recommended in a surf or where water is breaking on a bar.

Overruling a Scotch court, the House of Lords has sustained Dr. Caird, Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Glasgow, in his contention that he has a right of property in his lectures, as against students who report them for sale, and publishers who buy and print them. The question was a somewhat knotty one.

The fifth to ninth parts of Richard Andree's 'Allgemeiner Handatlas' (second edition) have been received by Westermann & Co. The maps are admirably executed, and present a good deal of novelty in the selection. Germany, of course, is particularly well served, and shown in almost every aspect, from physical conformation to language, religions, and mean temperature. Especially noteworthy in Europe is the map of the Balkan Peninsula, which we must still regard as a war-map of the future. Its fellow in that respect is the map of Central Asia and Further India, showing Russia's points of contact with British India through Afghanistan, and with China. Another useful Asiatic map embraces Eastern China and Corea. Germans have a special but not exclusive interest in the map of New Guinea and the Bismarck Archipelago, for comparison with which in area a map of Southwestern Germany, on the same scale, is annexed. We see the spreading of Germany, also, in the special map of German East Africa, which includes the great equatorial Nile lakes and Tanganyika. Very good to have, too, is the general map of Northeast Africa, whose compass takes in the territory from the Persian Gulf to the Upper Congo, and from Athens to the southern shore of the Victoria Nyanza. There is a fine map of the whole continent of Africa, with the international stakings-out called States, and a large and full one of Egypt. The maps of North America, the United States as a whole, and the Pacific States group, recommend this atlas to American buyers.

Dr. Theodor Barth has published (No. 1, 8 of the Popular Questions of the Day, Volkswirthschaftliche Zeitfragen, Berlin: Simion), in a modest pamphlet of thirty-one pages, under the title of 'Amerikanisches Wirthschaftsleben,' a summary of a lecture first printed in his journal, the Berlin Nation, on his impressions of America. As a Liberal member of the German Reichstag, as an experienced administrative officer in Bremen, where the German population stands in close commercial relations with America, and as the editor of a leading organ of anti-Bismarckian ideas, commercial, financial, and political, Dr. Barth is admirably fitted to interpret American economical opinions to his own countrymen. He regrets that American economists have not given more attention to the study of local prices, and thus made the groundwork for a better knowledge of home affairs, and deplores the time spent in threshing out the old truths of European and especially English writers. The Americans, with their wealth of endowments, ought to be able to correct the common errors still too prevalent abroad of the conditions of life in the United States. The publications of the Berlin Economical Society, of which Dr. Barth's pamphlet is the latest number, are well worth noting. Among its earlier issues are papers on American Harvests, by F. Kapp, on the Results of American Competition in Europe, by A. von Totis, and on a variety of topics, touching land, labor, wages, socialism, pauperism, education, discussed by men of recognized authority.

The tenth volume of the 'Catalogue général de la librairie française depuis 1840,' by Otto Lorenz (Paris: Lorenz; Boston: Schoenhof), is now in course of publication. We have already had occasion to notice the first numbers of the supplementary volumes (ix and x) which will complete the work to the end of 1885. The fascicule of nearly 400 large 8vo pages, just published, ends near the beginning of the letter P.

The "Bibliothèque Patriotique et Républicaine" (Paris: L. Boulanger; Boston: Schoenhof) is to be selected in a spirit diametrically opposed to that which presides over the choice in the "Nouvelle Bibliothèque Populaire," the similar Catholic publication, though both will have much common ground, as Molière, Corneille, and Racine already appear in each. The cover, as well as the name, of this newly started collection, which takes as its sub-title 'Les Livres du Peuple,' unmistakably indicates its object. Liberty is shown resting her right foot upon a tiara, and her left hand upon a slab on which are inscribed the words, "Les droits de l'homme." This series, like its fellow, is published at ten centimes a number. As yet only the first twenty numbers have been announced. The last we have seen, the tenth, is a very good selection from M. Jules Claretie's 'Les Derniers Montagnards.' Previously, two of M. Charles Floquet's speeches made up a volume, notably the one called "Le Cléricalisme," delivered at Lyons in 1880.

An expedition in charge of Prof. David P. Todd of Amherst College, sent out under the auspices of the National Academy of Sciences, and of Prof. Simon Newcomb, Superintendent of the Nautical Almanac, to observe the total eclipse of the sun in Japan, is now on its way across the Pacific in the Abyssinia, the first steamer of the line to Yokohama newly established by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. On landing, about July 5, the party will proceed at once to Tokio, where, upon conference with the officers of the Japanese Meteorological Service, the precise point of observation will be determined. This is expected to be somewhere in the region within a hundred miles to the north and west of Tokio, the capital itself lying just outside the path of total eclipse. The work of the party will be photographic in the main, the Observatory of Harvard College coöperating in the specialized research upon the sun's corona. On the invitation of Prof. Todd, William J. Holland, Ph.D., the distinguished entomologist, is attached to the party, and will report upon the natural history of the expedition.

—Scribner's opens its second volume with an admirable number, and yet the high grade of its articles is so evenly sustained, and their interest is so equal, that one does not at once realize the excellence of this magazine. In the present issue, the portrait of Napoleon which serves as a frontispiece introduces a second series of selections from Mr. Ropes's cabinet of prints illustrating the times of the Empire, and, by its heavier and materialized expression, prepares us for the second period of Bonaparte's career, which is rapidly sketched. All these later portraits are indicative of a gross change from the noble youthfulness of the early ones, and, though power remains, charm has faded from the features. The attractive face of Wolfe, and the characteristic English vigor and manliness of Wellington's profile, together with some fine caricatures, give further distinction to one of the best of portrait articles. Thackeray's letters naturally stand first in literary interest, and in this last instalment there is no flagging; one feels almost a friendly obligation to the Brookfields for being admitted to peruse such human memorials of a great man's private life, so pleasant in themselves, and more charming for what they reveal of the author's self. The letters of Eliza Southgate Bowne, written in her girlhood eighty years ago, promise some interior views of old New York; but the first bundle of them is confined to the fashion of Portland, Salem, and Boston, to a Saratoga tour with the Derbys, and her own wedding journey. Very bright they are, and no doubt full of interest to maidens of the Newport era and the relics of the old American families. Dr. Sargent opens the number with an exposition of his methods of measuring the body and charting the data so as to determine the variation of any example from the normal; and though the article is only preparatory, his suggestions are of the highest practical value to athletic associations and all interested in physical development. In his own phraseology, he is opening a chapter in a new science, anthropometry, in the utility of which he expresses great confidence. We must find space to mention, also, Mr. W. C. Brownell's very careful article upon the national character of the French, which is of an enlightening kind, though burdened in its earlier portion by a strange mixture of sociology, architecture, and nationalities. We like his observation and his reasoning on it far better than his philosophizing about history. The fiction is plentiful and entertaining.

—Harper's for July keeps even closer to the material facts of the age than is its custom. It presents little more than information in its pages, if one excepts its not remarkably imaginative fiction; and the interest which attaches to the number is that which belongs to facts simply as such. The processes which a book is put through in the making are the subject of its leading article, and are exhaustively described and well illustrated. The life of the cadets at West Point is treated with similar thoroughness, and gives occasion for some effective cuts; and "A Central Soudan Town" is the title of the third body-article, which also reaches the same high standard of execution in the literature of popular instruction. The perennial topic of the New South is utilized for a paper of mingled travel and fiction of the sort in which Mr. Warner's "Their Pilgrimage" was the pioneer; but it takes a peculiar talent to reconcile the diverse interests, and in this particular case the fiction is as transparent a fraud on the reader as were the children's moral stories of a generation ago. Mr. Warner is not at his best in his "Mexican Notes," which afford another chapter of facts. There is variety enough in this list, but the informing spirit and method of it are singularly monotonous; the intellectual life it represents is one of unrelieved materialism, and were it not for the very slight exception of Dr. Ely's paper on corporations, one would be forced to say that thought has no place in the body of this number.

—Prof. Conrad of Halle, in a recent series of articles on the evils of a cultured proletariat, undertakes to show that the danger to be apprehended from this source is much more formidable than any to be feared from an ignorant proletariat. It appears that the number of university students in Germany, which, twenty years ago, was 13,400, had risen to 17,800 ten years ago, and is now 28,000; during the last five years the number of students has increased twenty-six per cent., while the increase of population was only five per cent. It is shown by undoubted statistics that all the professions and trades which demand special training are becoming greatly overcrowded, and that a large and constantly increasing number of men who, at the sacrifice of not a few of the best years of their life, and considerable expense, have acquired a classical education, and have given evidence of ability, are forced to wait for years before they can obtain suitable positions. The inevitable consequence of this state of things, says Conrad, is a growing discontent among these classes, often stimulated by the pressure of actual need, and a lamentable disinclination to form family relations. Another consequence is the frequent abandonment of the profession for which a man has been trained, and the attempt to begin life over again in a new calling—a change involving the loss of years of training. Many, again, resort to emigration, and thus Germany loses some of her most promising sons, while those who remain form an element of discontent, and are only too ready to swell the ranks of the socialistic agitators. It is admitted that this overcrowding and competition has resulted in a demand for higher qualifications for all positions of responsibility, but this is considered a very insufficient compensation for the evil consequences. One of the chief causes of this condition of things is said to be the current prejudice in favor of intellectual as compared with manual labor—a prejudice which Conrad looks upon as a natural consequence of the highly developed school system, together with the strong bias towards classical culture, which, in Germany, secures for its possessor a higher degree of respect and social standing than is the case in any other country. Not only is a knowledge of Latin required in almost all civil-service positions, but it is said to be difficult for a man who does not possess a classical training to obtain due recognition of his abilities in any profession. Hence the necessity which parents feel of sending their children to the gymnasium, if they wish them to enter one of the learned professions.

—The course in the gymnasium is criticised as requiring too long a time, and it is shown that in 1885 51 per cent. of the Abiturienten, or pupils who had completed the gymnasium course, were over twenty years of age, and 27 per cent. were over twenty-one. The complaint is also made that in these schools two much stress is laid upon abstract mental work, so that not only are habits of observation not formed, but the faculty of observing closely is almost lost, while the entire attention of the pupil is drawn away from practical objects and directed towards intellectual culture. It may be well enough for the rich to educate their sons in this manner, but for the average man, who has to make his own fight for existence under many disadvantages, such an education is more hurtful than helpful. It enlarges the number of his daily wants, and if the means of satisfying these be lacking, the result is apt to be restlessness, discontent, and a distaste for the routine of business or industrial life. Moreover, many youths are carried through the gymnasium from class to class and pushed on to the university who possess no real desire or special aptitude for a scholarly life. For this the custom, which so largely obtains in German universities, of bestowing stipends upon needy students is in great measure responsible. It should be said that these stipends come from four different sources—the national exchequer, the university funds, city and school scholarships, and family or other private scholarships. The last class may be left out of the question, as they stand upon a different footing from the others. From the first two sources over $125,000 was distributed among German students in the year 1885-6, and it is estimated that from the third source nearly the same amount was expended, making in all about $250,000 bestowed annually in this way. The difficulty of obtaining exact information as to the number of students thus aided is very great, hence only an approximate estimate of their number can be formed. Judging, however, from the statistics available, it is safe to say that more than 25 per cent. of the German students are in receipt of more or less support from public funds. It is said that in cities where this system of stipends or scholarships is fully developed, it is often easier for a mechanic to help his son to a parsonage than to a position as a master mechanic; and every year large numbers of needy students, provided with letters of recommendation, are sent up to the universities, which find themselves obliged to provide for the needs of these beneficiaries without any certainty of bestowing their aid upon worthy recipients.

—M. Octave Uzanne's new essay on modern book-binding, 'La Reliure Moderne' (Paris: Rouveyre; New York: F. W. Christern), appears in a sumptuous quarto with sixty Dujardin photogravures, probably the best display of beautifully bound books ever contained in a single volume, and certainly the most novel and original, not to say eccentric. No doubt M. Uzanne himself would be the first to acknowledge that these engravings are of greater interest and of more importance than the characteristically rambling essays which they accompany—we were about to say illustrate, but this is exactly what they fail to do, as there is scarcely the slightest connection between the text and the plates. The text consists of five lively little essays on historic book-binding and those who have written about it, on the bibliophiles of to-day and the decoration of their books, on full bindings, on half bindings, and on fancy bindings. In the main M. Uzanne's book is a plea for unconventionality and freer fantasy. He protests against the slavish imitation of the great binders of the past, and advocates a more modern development of the art. He suggests the employment of a wider range of materials than those to be found in ordinary binders' shops; he advocates the use of old brocades, of Oriental stuffs, of Japanese leather-papers, and of the skins of animals not habitually employed. He urges a unity between cover and contents. In every binding there should be an appropriateness to the book or its author or its subject. From M. Uzanne's pages we should be inclined to think that alligator and seal bindings are almost unknown in France, and that tree-calf—a beautiful but frail binding—is almost forgotten there. We have not space to give the attention to the plates that they deserve. We may note only the best bit of irony in binding we have ever seen. There is an engraving here of M. Philippe Burty's copy of 'Napoléon le Petit,' bound in morocco, with a deep panel on one side, in which there is set one of the embroidered bees from the throne of Napoleon III., taken from the Tuileries after Sedan.

—The Nahuatl Dictionary of Rémi Siméon is a recent literary achievement of such vast labor and importance that a short review can hardly do justice to it. The author has endeavored to gather into one volume all the terms and proper nouns of the literary Mexican language found in the earlier dictionaries, histories, prayer-books, translations, and other Aztec texts. He took as a base to work upon the second edition (1571) of A. de Molina's Mexican Dictionary, as being the only comprehensive collection of words from the period when Aztec was still spoken in its purity, and thus succeeded in gathering about 27,000 items. Wherever it could be done with safety, the terms of the language have been reduced to their radicals or bases; of the verbs, the preterit and sometimes the future forms are indicated, thus showing whether the verb is construed with the personal (te) or the inanimate-object particle (tla), or with both. In the case of the nouns, the author has been careful to mention the forms of the plural, which is often double; for their better elucidation, an array of phrases and sentences is often added to words having many meanings. The definitions are well selected and to the point, and the authorities for statements are added whenever it seemed desirable to refer to them. From Siméon's list of those consulted, it would seem as if the vulgar Aztec language of the present day had been excluded from the book, though we have found no allusion to this circumstance. The introduction contains a grammar of the early Aztec, composed after that of Andrea de Olmos, the oldest but substantially accurate grammar of this Indian language (1547), which had been previously edited by M. Siméon. The sounds of the language are not described with all the precision desirable—a too common fault in similar works. Another part of the introduction reproduces the classification of all the Indian tongues spoken in the Mexican States from Pimentel's 'Cuadro' (1865), a work itself based upon Orozco y Berra. This classification is so full of evident errors that its presence in this volume can but be deeply regretted. The Dictionary was printed at the expense of the French Government at the "Imprimerie Nationale," and forms a beautiful large quarto volume of nearly eight hundred pages. Thus far only the Nahuatl-French part has been published; whether a French-Nahuatl part is contemplated or not, we have not learned.

RECENT RAILWAY PUBLICATIONS.

Railway Practice: Its Principles and Suggested Reforms Reviewed. By E. Porter Alexander. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1887.

Railway Rates, English and Foreign. By J. Grierson, General Manager of the Great Western Railway. London: Edward Stanford. 1886.

Railway Problems: An Inquiry into the Economic Conditions of Railway Working in Different Countries. By J. S. Jeans. London: Longmans. 1887.

The Handling of Railway Supplies: Their Purchase and Disposition. By Marshall M. Kirkman. Chicago: Charles N. Triviss. 1887.

THE growth of this kind of railroad literature in the last two years is something remarkable. Previous to this time, books on railroad administration were rare, and the few that existed were of a somewhat technical character. They dealt either with railroad engineering, railroad law, or the minor details of railroad operation. To-day, however, we have treatises on railroad economy in the broader sense; on the earnings and expenditures of railroads in their relation to the interests of the general public.

Gen. Alexander's book is a short one, but it contains no lack of vigorous and useful matter. He deals with the principles which govern railroad rates; and, unlike many of those who have written on this subject, he speaks from practical experience. He first describes at some length the actual scheme of rates which prevails in the United States; the way in which competitive and non-competitive points are treated; and the systems adopted by various traffic associations in forming their schedules of charge. His extracts from the rate-book of the trunk lines give an excellent idea of how railroad tariffs look. Most persons who read his pages for the first time will be astonished to find how small a proportion of our older tariffs violated the "long-and-short haul" principle. In one respect Gen. Alexander's presentation of the case is too favorable for the railroads. A reader who should take his ideas from this book alone, would not imagine how largely the practice of granting special rates had been abused. He would overestimate the importance of the tariff schedule and underestimate the deviations from it. But almost every one who reads this book will read some other book that falls into the opposite error, and the one will fairly enough offset the other.

Gen. Alexander next criticises proposed plans of railway reform developed by Prof. Ely and Mr. Hudson. He shows the difficulties involved in Mr. Ely's plan of State control, not merely as a matter of administration, but as a matter of political corruption; pointing out that the very dangers of which Mr. Ely complains to-day would be aggravated rather than lessened by a system of State ownership. Against Mr. Hudson's plan, by which the carriers were to be separate from the railroads, he brings up the old objections which occur to every railroad man, and a new one which is worth noticing:

"It must ever remain impossible," he says, "for many rival carriers to occupy the same depots and make up their trains with shifting engines in the same yard. Each carrier must have his own yards and terminal facilities. But available space for such facilities in our large cities can only be had at enormous expense. A few large transportation companies would speedily be formed who would monopolize the entire transportation business of the country. Small carriers could not possibly gain or maintain a footing against them. And the large companies would speedily unite and pool or divide territory. If Mr. Hudson had started out to devise a plan by which the transportation interests of the United States could be most rapidly consolidated into the most complete and irresponsible monopoly possible, he could not have suggested anything half so certain and speedy of operation as what he has suggested to bring about the very opposite result."

Mr. Grierson's book does for England on a somewhat larger scale what Gen. Alexander does for America. That is to say, it takes specific instances of English railroad tariffs and defends them against their critics. The book is not exactly of a kind to command general interest—at any rate, outside of England—but it is extremely good in its way. In the recent Parliamentary investigations, Mr. Grierson has habitually presented the general case for the English railroads very much as it has been done by Mr. Blanchard or Mr. Fink in the United States. He therefore writes as an advocate, though by no means as an extremist. There is nothing particularly new in his conclusions, but the facts by which he supports them are fresh and often highly instructive. To most American readers the chief interest will lie in seeing how the long-and-short-haul difficulty which is now perplexing the Inter-State Commerce Commission has come up in nearly the same form and extent in England and on the continent of Europe. The selections from English and Continental tariffs, though made with a view to refute a pamphlet of Sir Bernhard Samuelson, are well chosen and extremely convenient. We know of no other place where this material is so fairly presented to the English reader.

Mr. Jeans's book is disappointing. It is handsomely got up, and the general scheme looks interesting. But the writer is quite incompetent to deal with the subject; and, what is still more surprising in a professed statistician, he is careless in the use of figures. A few examples will suffice: On page 102 he gives the average earnings of the United States railroads per train mile in 1883 as eight shillings. They actually were only about two-thirds of this sum, and any one at all familiar with the facts of the case would have seen that this was an error. In fact, Mr. Jeans himself in one place in his book gives substantially the right figures; but he habitually uses the wrong one as a basis of his reasoning, and apparently does not notice the inconsistency. This mistake, however, shows in worse colors when we attempt to see how it arose. The earnings per train mile are, of course, determined by dividing the gross traffic earnings by the total train mileage. Now, Mr. Jeans's figure for the gross earnings is somewhat wrong, being a little too high. His figure for the train mileage is so absolutely wrong that it is impossible even to guess what he based it on. And, finally, if we divide his dividend by his divisor, we do not get his quotient. He seems to have acted on the principle that bad reasoning from bad premises might bring out a good result.

Examples might be multiplied almost indefinitely. One of the most remarkable is on page 68, where he makes out that in the year 1884 the percentage of dividends on railroads in the United States rose to five and four-tenths; whereas it was actually less than two and five-tenths, according to the figures given in Poor's Manual. And when it comes to dealing with facts, our author is as badly off as when he deals with figures. He says that in the United States there is a system commonly known as pooling or dividing the traffic receipts, which "has no exact counterpart in other countries"; that in the United Kingdom much the same results are arrived at by an arrangement as to rates and fares; and that on the continent of Europe neither system prevails to any great extent. It is simply incredible that a man could have been in Mr. Jeans's position as Secretary of the British Iron Trade Association and not know anything more about the facts. So far from neither system prevailing on the continent of Europe, both systems have been applied, as a matter of course more uniformly than in England or America, while in England competing traffic has been divided by no less high an authority than Mr. Gladstone himself; and English pooling arrangements have been the exact counterpart of those in the United States, except that they have been more steadily maintained.

Nor is our author any more trustworthy in the use which he makes of the facts which he has. In trying to determine the comparative economy of State and private management, he takes as a standard the percentage of administrative expenses to other operating expenses. Now, of course, such a percentage might be made to appear low by wastefulness in other items precisely as well as by economy in administrative ones. The comparison proves nothing. In point of fact, the question whether the percentage of administrative expenses is large or small depends almost entirely upon the extent of railways concentrated under a single management. In the majority of cases the State, where it owns part of the railroads, will have the main system and the companies the local lines. Where the case is reversed, as in France, the relation of the figures will be reversed. This is a perfectly simple and commonplace explanation of the facts on which Mr. Jeans lays so much stress.

It is a pity that the book is so untrustworthy; for if its figures and facts could be relied on, it would meet a real want. But we are bound to say that Mr. Jeans has not made use of a great many sources of information which were open to him, and that those of which he has availed himself have been carelessly used. It shows how little knowledge of railroad administration there is among economists and statisticians that the substance of this book should have been published in the Journal of the Statistical Society and in the Bulletin de l'Institut International de Statistique without meeting destructive criticism.

Mr. Kirkman is well known as a railroad man of experience and a somewhat voluminous writer on matters of railroad administration. What he says is generally good, but a little more care in putting it together would be greatly to the reader's advantage. The author is kept so busy by his practical work that he does not always find time to condense his ideas before he puts them in print. Some of the most amusing instances of carelessness occur in the index, from which we select a few headings by way of illustration: Cause of Envy; Effect of Climate on Coal—of Envy—of Saving; Facilities, lack of; Fruit of Riches; How to Acquire Wealth. In one sense these are trifles, but they indicate slovenly preparation which seriously detracts from the merit of the book.

BRITISH POWER IN INDIA.

The Rise of the British Power in the East. By the late Hon. Mountstuart Elphinstone. Edited by Sir Edward Colebrooke, Bart. London: Murray. 1887.

THE addition of this portly volume to the vast, dreary, and increasing mountain of Anglo-Indian literature is wholly without excuse. The Hon. Mountstuart Elphinstone was an able and accomplished member of the Indian Civil Service, who, after a distinguished official career, devoted the evening of his days to literary pursuits. Among other books, he projected a history of India from the earliest times to his own day, but he published during his own lifetime only those portions of it which dealt with the Hindu and Mohammedan periods. The present volume, which is concerned with the rise of British power in the East and the earlier exploits of Clive, has been published from manuscripts he left behind him. Had it appeared at the time it was written, as an episode in a larger and continuous history, it would have needed no apology. Moreover, at that time the subject still retained something of novelty and freshness. But it so happens that, since Mr. Elphinstone's death, the story of the adventures, battles, and victories of Clive and his immediate successors has been told and retold several times over; and these pages do not add a single fact to those which Macaulay's well-known essay has made familiar to all readers.

In another way the treatment of the subject is grievously defective. Historians of British India have invariably fastened upon the campaigns —upon the records of battles and sieges—and have recounted these at tedious length, as if in them were comprised all that was of importance in the substitution of British rule for the sway of the native princes of India. Actually, in their consequences to the country and the people, these were of small significance compared with another series of facts which they have almost or wholly ignored. There was a man of that time who, though he had never been in India, apprehended the vital significance of this other series with the insight of genius; and in the great Indian speeches of Edmund Burke, and in his celebrated "Ninth Report," the student of history will learn more of the inner character of that marvellous revolution which conferred the sovereignty of the East upon a British trading corporation than in all the (so called) histories of that occurrence. To this hour the frightful poverty of the Indian agricultural classes is the difficulty which has baffled all the skill, thought, and ingenuity of Indian administrators. In spite of roads, railways, and canals, in spite of assessments which, on paper, can be demonstrated to be moderation itself, the Indian agriculturist insists upon remaining a wretched, unclothed, insufficiently nourished, and hopelessly indebted creature. His life is a life of toil, with nothing brighter than fever, cholera, or famine as its final goal. And yet it can be shown, beyond all reasonable question, that before the rising of British rule the state of this same ryot, notwithstanding the seemingly incessant disorder of the country, was sufficiently prosperous. Now, it was during the rise of British power in the East that the seeds of this dire poverty were sown. They were not perceived until they had, so to speak, struck vigorous root in the soil; and as with certain noxious grasses, well known to the Indian agriculturists, which spring up in the standing crops, spread abroad with appalling rapidity, and defy all efforts at eradication, so has it been with the after consequences of these early errors. Their true nature never having been understood—not being understood to this day—they have positively flourished upon the futile attempts to remove them out of the land. In his "Ninth Report" and his Indian speeches, Burke has pointed out the cause, in the unnatural combination, namely, of sovereignty and commerce in the mercantile rulers of India. The East India Company were driven by the exigencies of their position to treat their Indian Empire just as an Irish absentee landlord of the old time, and with extravagant inclinations, treated the tenants on his estates. Every farthing of surplus revenue was swept out of the country, year after year, in order to win the good-will of Ministers and provide dividends for the proprietors of East India stock. Under such a system, a lavish scale of expenditure in India itself presented itself to Anglo-Indian officials in the light of a virtue. There was, in fact, a perpetual struggle going on between the authorities in Calcutta and the Directors in Leadenhall Street as to the partition of the Indian revenues between them; and Burke has shown, with astonishing power and insight, the ruin wrought upon the trade, the manufactures, and the agriculture of India by this unnatural strife—a ruin from which the people have never recovered.

Of all these things Mr. Mountstuart Elphinstone would appear to have been ignorant. He is at least altogether silent respecting them. His history is a mere "drum-and-trumpet" affair, made up of "alarums," "skirmishes," and the like incidents. The Indian peninsula is, literally, the "theatre of war," and nothing besides. There might have been no inhabitants in it for all that we are permitted to hear about them. We do not mean to say that Mr. Elphinstone is, in this respect, a worse sinner than other of his countrymen who have written upon the same subject. All alike have deliberately turned aside from the path of inquiry which Burke was the first to open out. But the fact that Mr. Elphinstone had only walked in the old well-worn rut ought, we think, to have convinced his editor that the publication of the present volume was a waste of time and trouble.

Mr. Elphinstone, however, though he has nothing new to tell us, relates the old story with simplicity and spirit. And the founding of the British Empire in India is a history so strange and marvellous that it will stand a great many readings. The people of India, if they are impatient under subjection to an alien rule, must acknowledge, if they are candid, that the blame rests wholly with themselves. The odds were all on their side. Their princes commanded thousands, where Clive and Lawrence and Adams commanded but their tens. The world has never witnessed acts of more splendid audacity than the manner in which unknown captains and majors hurled their three or four hundred English soldiers against armies of eight and ten thousand Orientals holding entrenched positions, heavily mounted with artillery. After his varied experience of war, the Duke of Wellington said that, in the quality of reckless daring, no troops he had ever seen were the equals of the English regiments in India; and the incidents recorded in this volume are an abundant confirmation of this judgment. Take, for example, the battle of Udha-nálá. The army of the Bengal subahdar, 60,000 strong, was protected by a line of entrenchments, beyond which was a deep wet ditch fifty or sixty feet broad; and the position was further defended by one hundred guns. Major Adams attacked this huge host at the head of 700 Englishmen and 2,000 Sepoys, and utterly defeated it. The exploits of the small French armies, in the days of their greatness, were no less astonishing; and though the losses sustained in these actions look small, yet, relatively to the numbers engaged, they were very heavy, and indicate in the clearest way the indomitable pluck and endurance of the European soldiers. Curious, too, is it to contrast the behavior of the great Frenchmen of those early times, Dupleix and Bussy, with their English rivals, Clive and Hastings.

In these, its early days, the English East India Company had no higher ambition than to carry on a profitable trade with India. It dreamed not of conquest or empire. Its existence was, in truth, a precarious one. Its monopoly was an object of jealousy to the merchants of Great Britain, and it was obliged to be constantly upon its guard against the assaults of formidable rivals. Under these circumstances, its chief care was to efface itself as much as possible, to undertake no action of a kind to excite public attention and comment. The French East India Company, on the contrary, was the "spoiled darling" of the French monarchy. The Government freely supplied it with subsidies. Its leading officials were nominated by the State, and French Ministers took an active part in determining, not its commercial proceedings, but its political conduct towards the native princes. To Dupleix belongs the credit of having been the first to discover how, by means of a small body of European troops, skilfully employed, a French empire might be carved out of the crumbling ruins of the great Delhi monarchy. All his alliances with the native sovereigns were regulated so as to aid in the realizing of this idea. In the end, however, as Mr. Elphinstone points out, the intervention of the State at home, which seemed at first to give to the French so great a superiority over their English rivals, proved the cause of their ruin. It seemed to give them power, but, by restricting their initiative, and interfering at every step with their independence of action, it robbed them of much more than it gave. Clive could never have accomplished his great achievements had he been the servant of an English Minister dictating directions to him from his office in London. Next to his own audacity and fearlessness, he owed his success to the fact of his independence; but, unlike the French, his policy was at no time dictated by a prevision of empire, but only by the present necessities of the situation. And this difference in their outlook would seem to have impressed itself upon their manners in a remarkable way. Mr. Elphinstone quotes the following from the French translator of the 'Seir ul Mutakherin,' in which the difference is well described:

"If any one had seen M. de Bussy and Col. Clive or Mr. Hastings in the height of their power and influence, he may have taken from these two or three individuals a pretty good idea of the different geniuses of the French and English nations. M. de Bussy always wore embroidered clothes or brocade, with an embroidered hat, and, on days of ceremony, embroidered shoes of black velvet. He was seen in an immense tent, full sufficient for 600 men, of about thirty feet in elevation; at one end of this tent he sat on an armchair, embroidered with his King's arms, placed upon an elevation, which last was covered by a crimson carpet of embroidered velvet. At his right and left, but upon back chairs only, sat a dozen of his officers. Over against him his French guard on horseback, and behind these his Turkish guards. His table, always in plate, was served with three, often with four, services. To this French magnificence he added all the parade and pageant of Hindustani manners. A numerous set of tents, always on an elephant himself, as were all his officers, he was preceded by heralds on horseback and by a set of musicians singing his feats of chivalry, with always two head heralds reciting his eulogium. Col. Clive always wore his regimentals in the field, was always on horseback, and never rode in a palanquin; he had a plentiful table, but noways delicate, and never more than two services. He used to march mostly at the head of the column with his aides-de-camp, or was hunting to the right and left. He never wore silks but in town. Gov. Hastings always wore a plain coat of English broadcloth, and never anything like lace or embroidery. His whole retinue a dozen of horseguards; his throne a plain chair of mahogany with plenty of such thrones in the hall; his table sometimes neglected; his diet sparing and always abstemious; his address and deportment very distant from pride and still more so from familiarity."

Life and Services of Gen. John A. Logan, as Soldier and Statesman. By George Francis Dawson, ex-Librarian of United States Senate. Belford, Clarke & Co. 1887. Pp. 580.

This book has all the marks of a "campaign life," prepared for use in an election and afterwards adapted to publication as a post-mortem biography. It has the same indiscriminate praise of the subject, the superlative estimate of all he did, the assumption that at every stage of his career he was the chief figure of his time, the belittling or depreciation of everybody who was in contact with him, the scrap-book collection of laudatory newspaper notices of him, the usual excerpts from his "great speeches." It would seem to be written by a political henchman, with all the henchman's blind adoration of the man to whose fortunes he has attached himself, and to whom he looks for place and promotion. It is a pity that the story of Logan's life should be told in this way; for there was enough in it of the romantic and the picturesque to have made a permanently pleasing book, if the material were used by a competent literary hand, and by a writer not dominated by the habits and influences of personal and political subordination. The book would not have been so big a one, but it would have had a longer life.

Logan was a born politician of a certain type. From his nature he was nothing if not partisan. He had a boiling energy which prompted him to be in the thickest of every fray, and a certain sounding fluency that captivated the average crowd. As things have gone in American politics, this passes for political leadership, but it is a purely physical leadership. Every crowd has its leader in this sense, whether it be a respectable mass meeting or an Anarchist mob. There is nothing of intellectual leadership in it. It means simply the infusing of working or voting zeal into a mass of people, in behalf of plans, ideas, or purposes that have been thought out by somebody else, somewhere else. Logan had nothing to do with originating. Whether he was following Douglas before the war in the rash attempt to fasten slavery upon Kansas under the absurd disguise of "squatter sovereignty," or following Lincoln in the general abolition of slavery after the war began, he was the same dashing, vigorous, reckless advocate of the views and purposes which he had accepted from the more intellectual men who were for the nonce his leaders. He was sincere in his convictions, for with such a temperament convictions are as much a matter of feeling as of reason. If there was any inconsistency in his course, he was not aware of it, and was never troubled with doubts. His vanity was great and made him see all minor matters in their relation to his own personality. This kept him in a condition of chronic chafing with others which he mistook for independence; yet his instinctive regard for organization was such that he could accept a disappointment, though not with a good grace, and, saving his right to grumble, would not cease to work because he had been defeated or thwarted.

The traits thus sketched are those of a man essentially a subordinate, though of a nature strong enough to push him to the most important positions of the second class. His early education was incomplete, and, once entered upon active life, he had no time to repair its deficiencies. This put him at a disadvantage in the Senate, as it would have done at the bar had he continued in active practice; before the popular gatherings on his "stamping ground" of southern Illinois he was in his element, and there was scarce any limit to his popularity there.

His military career was one in which his best powers found their fittest field, and his weaknesses were least obvious. He was never burdened with the responsibility of independent command, and as a subordinate, putting into execution the plans and orders of his commander, he was in many respects a model officer. His courage was brilliant, and he gloried in the stimulus of a ride down his lines under the hottest fire. His enthusiasm was demonstrative and contagious, so that his troops were roused to a sympathy with his own daring that made them again and again perform prodigies of valor. He cultivated the peculiarities of bearing and of costume which gave him individuality with his soldiers. He took pride in the cognomen of "Black Jack," and would not cut the long black hair and drooping moustache which made his swarthy figure everywhere noticeable. In command of a regiment, a brigade, a division, and a corps, he had a continuous and brilliant success, though always more or less insubordinate, and wilful to an extent that diminished the satisfaction of his superiors in their relations to him. He was often despotic and unreasonable with his immediate subordinates, though kind and considerate with those so near his person as to be dependent upon him.

In both his political and military life, the character is plainly identical; but the warlike experience was one in which, in his position, the duty before him was an almost purely executive one, in which courage, dash, and energy counted for so much as to make success certain. His was the physical much more than the intellectual part of war, and in every campaign he was under men of self-reliant will and of broader intellect than his own. He was probably at his best in the command of a division, where his person could be seen by all his men at once and his example have its full effect. In the higher commands, the influence and control become more intellectual, and the exhibition of personal daring and dash would be at the sacrifice of the larger grasp of the forces which are wielded. Had he remained in command of the Army of the Tennessee after McPherson's death, there is no reasonable doubt that he would have performed his duties creditably under the eye of Sherman. His ambition would have been gratified; but with such a man as Blair for his subordinate, whose intellect was of a much higher type, his career would not have been so desirable as in command of the Fifteenth Corps, where the devotion to him was enthusiastic and where no one questioned his military preeminence.

In both phases of his life he lacked the element of content. The restless desire for something different from that which he had, prevented the full enjoyment even of his own successes; and perhaps the only moments of unalloyed pleasure were when his soldiers cheered a daring exploit, or a vast popular audience made the welkin ring at one of his happy hits or extravagant figures. It is right to add that his patriotism was genuine and his ambition a frank and honest one. His last great public grief was at the attacks of party friends upon conduct of his which was dictated by generosity to a political opponent, and he felt it the more keenly because he was conscious that his partisanship had usually gone beyond that of his party critics. No one suspected him of corruption in pecuniary matters, and he had the distinction (if, with shame, we must confess it to be a distinction in American politics) of refraining from using the means of amassing wealth which are often pressed upon public men.

The First Nine Years of the Bank of England. An Enquiry into a Weekly Record of the Price of Bank Stock from August 17, 1694, to September 17, 1703. By James E. Thorold Rogers. Macmillan & Co. 1887.

THIS essay is a digression from Prof. Rogers's 'History of Agriculture and Prices in England.' While examining material preparatory to the fifth and sixth volumes of the larger work, the author became impressed with the special importance of a few records, seldom consulted, which have preserved the early history of the Bank of England. One of these was a weekly newspaper published by John Houghton, an apothecary, from August 17, 1694, to September 17, 1703. Houghton was a Fellow of the Royal Society and a friend of the astronomer Halley. His newspaper made its appearance regularly during the nine years and was much liked by his contemporaries. Its publication was suspended, not, as newspapers are commonly discontinued, by the chills of adversity, but for the contrary reason. The last number contained a statement that the editor's business had grown to such an extent that he could no longer find time to prepare the copy for the printers. One complete file of Houghton's paper exists in the Bodleian Library. Houghton published the weekly price-lists of the shares of the Bank of England, of the two East India Companies, the Hudson's Bay Company, and the African Company; also the rate of exchange on Amsterdam and the prices of corn and other staple articles in the principal market towns. Another original source of material, and an extremely valuable one, is Luttrell's Diary, first used by Macaulay and printed at his instance by the Oxford University Press. Prof. Rogers bears testimony to the "exceeding fairness and cautious accuracy" of Macaulay. "The picturesque character of Macaulay's style," he says, "has perhaps induced some dull persons to think that he strove after mere effect, but that, after all, his realities are unreal. I can only say that I have found him scrupulously just."

The charter of the Bank of England was granted by Parliament July 24, 1694, with the prime object of obtaining a war loan of £1,200,000. The privileges granted to the Bank were upon the condition that this sum should be paid into the Exchequer within a fixed time. The right to issue notes was one of the compensations for the loan. The powers bestowed upon the Bank were analogous to those exercised by the goldsmiths, the private bankers of the period. The goldsmiths received deposits and issued their own bills for them. These bills entered into trade and passed as the equivalent of money until returned for redemption. They were not simple storage receipts, like the early bills of the banks of Venice, Genoa, and Amsterdam, but were the I O U's of the goldsmiths. It was understood that the depositors' money would be loaned and that the goldsmith-banker would keep a sufficient cash reserve to meet any probable demand for the redemption of his bills. The early banks of the Continent, on the other hand, held the identical money they received from their customers, issuing no more notes than the equivalent of the coin on deposit. They derived their profit from the premium their notes bore over the heterogeneous coins in circulation, and from certain exclusive privileges that they enjoyed in the discount of bills of exchange. There was a panic and a run on the Bank of Amsterdam in 1672. It was then found that the practice of the Bank was in strict accord with the theory—the identical pieces, and all of them, being in the vaults corresponding to the outstanding bills. The Bank of England followed the course of the London goldsmiths. "It purported to give in its bills the equivalent of what it had received, but it never pretended to take the deposit for any other purpose than trading with it." The likeness of our national banking system can be seen in the birth of the Bank of England. The Bank's capital was loaned to the Government "to the last shilling," and it received in return interest on the loan and also the right to issue circulating notes on condition of redeeming them on demand.

The Bank had many enemies from the very start. The goldsmiths were violently opposed to it on business grounds: it interfered with their profits. The Tories were opposed to it on political grounds. The landowners were opposed to it on social and religious grounds, since it represented the rising power of commerce in the State and of dissent in religion. Its most formidable antagonist was Chamberlain's Land Bank, a ridiculous scheme, much favored by the aristocracy. Chamberlain was an accoucheur with a penchant for grand finance. He conceived the idea of establishing a bank with money borrowed by mortgages on land, lending the money to the Government and issuing notes to be loaned at three and a half per cent. to the mortgagors. The mortgagors were to receive the stock of the Bank and derive profits from the dividends paid by the Government equal to the interest due on the mortgages, and obtain loans from the Bank when needed by them at one-half the customary rate of interest. Under such a scheme, it would be practicable for a landowner to borrow by mortgage to-day, invest the proceeds in Bank stock to-morrow, and borrow money from the Bank the next day to pay off the mortgage, retiring with a net income of three and a half per cent. on the amount juggled with. There was no restriction to prevent the same person from performing the feat a second time. This ludicrous project of the "man midwife," as Luttrell calls him, gained so much favor among the landed gentry that it passed both houses of Parliament, and was favored by King William so far that books of subscription were opened on the 9th of June, 1696, under the charge of commissioners appointed by the Crown. But subscriptions did not come in. The Land Bank collapsed in embryo. "The King and his advisers were embarrassed; the landed interest was disappointed, enraged, and probably thought that what they called 'crying down the Land Bank' was some financial witchcraft or evil eye on the part of the moneyed men, which cheated them of their reasonable hopes."

The episode of the Land Bank was the first crisis of the Bank of England. Chamberlain's scheme was the rallying-point of all the opposition to the Bank. So great a hubbub was raised by it that the shares of the Bank declined from 107 to 83. Other crises, and more trying ones, ensued—these connected with the war in the Low Countries. The first deputy governor of the Bank, Godfrey, was killed in the trenches at Namur, whither he and two other directors had gone to provide funds for paying the army. We get a glimpse of the method of transferring funds from one country to another for military use at that time by reading that the governor, deputy governor, and one director of the Bank went over to Antwerp and set up a mint to coin money to pay the army; but as the mint could not work fast enough, they (the Bank directors) borrowed £100,000 from the Bank of Amsterdam for the purpose. The capture of Namur, which took place soon afterwards, was ascribed to the good feeling produced by the punctual payment of the troops.

The state of the coinage at this time was so deplorable, by reason of wearing, sweating, and clipping, that exchange between London and Amsterdam in 1695 was as much as thirty-eight per cent. against the former. "In this crisis," says Prof. Rogers, "the Bank ran its greatest perils, did some of its best services, and established the confidence which has made it so famous." The restoration of the coinage cost the Treasury upwards of $2,700,000—a very large sum in those trying times, being nearly equivalent to a year and a half's ordinary revenue, and as hard to be borne, the author thinks, as a hundred millions at the present time. But its value to the country, in the way of establishing the public credit and imparting confidence to every department of trade and industry, was beyond computation. The name of Montague is rendered illustrious by this achievement.

The history of the Bank during the nine years is so closely connected with the history of the Government that our author deals necessarily with the political contentions of the time, and also with military operations on the Continent. These relations give to the volume a spice of interest usually lacking in financial treatises. There is scant room for criticism to one who has not access to the rare sources consulted by the author. We can only say that in this, as in all his work in the field of political economy, Prof. Rogers employs the best methods of study and the soundest rules of interpretation.

Obiter Dicta. Second Series. By Augustine Birrell. Charles Scribner's Sons. 1887.

THERE is in this volume just that blending of a just literary taste with an unobtrusive refined humor which makes a charming book. Milton, Johnson, and Burke are simply hopeless material for fresh essays, but by dint of keeping his individuality alert and responsive, and holding close by the perennial genuineness of these great lives, the author has made something new of them, something that causes us to forget they are classics, awakens our interest, and stirs us to the point of avidity to learn what he has to say in his lighthearted and truthful affection for the old favorites. He sums up Pope when he says he should as soon think of asking whether a centipede has legs or a wasp a sting as whether he was or was not a poet; and in the course of his very humane handling of that distorted body of sensibilities and rancors which was Pope, he pleads his very best defence by reminding us that Arburthnot loved him; there must have been something amiable in him, even if it only overflowed from the good, sensible doctor. The essay upon Burke is the most pleasing to ourselves; there is an absence of weight in it which is an altogether novel quality in the subject, and there is next to nothing about his speeches. The constant gleam of humor that plays over the page helps us to remember all the while that Burke was an Irishman. Apropos of his quarrel with Hamilton, the author remarks: "Few men can afford to be angry; it is a run upon their intellectual resources that they cannot meet"; and he praises Burke's exhaustless indignation accordingly. He says well that it is a sign of Burke's stupendous greatness that when "his name is pitted against the outcome of centuries, and we say Burke and the French Revolution, we are not overwhelmed by any sense of obvious absurdity or incongruity." It is exquisite to hear a man say that "the true mode of critical approach to copies of Latin verse is by the question—How bad are they?"—to have him find Dr. Johnson every whit as interesting in his life of Sprat as of Milton or Gray, and add, "he is also much less provoking"; to have Arnold's dealing with a hapless author succinctly described as "kittenish," and to read in the opening paragraph of a paper the chance remark—"You may live like a gentleman for a twelvemonth on Hazlitt's ideas." This is the true lover of books, perhaps a trifle too refined for the general public, it must be said. "Beshrew the general public," he says himself; "what in the name of the Bodleian has the general public got to do with literature? The general public subscribes to Mudie, and has its intellectual, like its lacteal sustenance, sent round to it in carts." He turns his eyes occasionally towards this country, and quotes with delicious appositeness, in regard to Mr. Howells's views of Thackeray and Sir Walter and the rest:

"My grief lies onward and my joy behind."

He touches on the sacred precincts of "Boston life and intellect" in Emerson's day: "It does not seem to have been a very strong place. We lack performance." He even finds a fault to peck at in Dr. Holmes, and declares that his "literary perspective" is "every bit as bad" as Emerson's, which he has just told us was "very early," and cites the Doctor's remarks about the redundant syllable—"Shakspere and Milton knew how to use it effectively; Shelley employed it freely, Bryant indulged in it; Willis was fond of it," and, adds our author, "I dare say he was, but we are not fond of Willis, and cannot help regarding the citation of his poetical example as an outrage." This comes the nearest to being an "explosion" of anything in the book, and it will amuse American readers. But the volume is full of "plums" of one kind and another, is solid in literary judgment, humane and truthful to an extraordinary degree, and thoroughly readable.

When I was a Boy in China. By Yan Phou Li. Boston: D. Lothrop Co.

THIS little book of about one hundred pages is a revelation of Chinese home life which all Americans ought to read. It is the frank story of a young man who tells the truth without reserve, with Biblical quaintness and antique simplicity. He seems to have no "purpose" or "tendency" in view, but only to inform as to the facts. Further, the style is terse, clear, straightforward, fluent, refined, and idiomatic. Mr. Yan Phou Lee is, or was, a student in Yale College, one of the number sent over a few years ago, under the auspices of Yung Wing, who has been able to remain until graduation from an American college. Belonging to the mighty tribe or family of Li (Lee), he was born on the 21st day of the second moon, in the first year of the reign of the Emperor Tung Che; which, if our calculations be correct, was April 11, 1861. His personal name, Yan Phou, means "Wealth by Imperial Favor." Like most Chinese and Japanese living abroad, he now arranges his name in accordance with the western method. In Chinese civilization, "the individual withers," and the clan is "more and more"; consequently, the family name comes first. With us, initials are vastly important, and family and locality less so.

While written originally for young people, and therefore lively and readable, Mr. Li's papers make solid and enriching reading for seniors. His twelve chapters would be very widening to the mental horizon of one fed wholly either on missionary reports or Sand-Lot eloquence. "Infancy," "The House and Household," "Chinese Cookery," "Games and Pastimes," "Girls of My Acquaintance," "Schools and School Life," "Religions," "Chinese Holidays," "Stories and Story Tellers," "How I Went to Shanghai," "How I Prepared for America," "First Experiences in America," are the suggestive titles of the chapters. Among those recounted in the last chapter are a midcontinent train robbery by masked road-agents, and a hug and kiss by an American lady, both being equally amazing to the lad.

Greek Lessons. Prepared to accompany the Grammar of Hadley and Allen. By Robert P. Keep. D. Appleton & Co. 1886.

DR. KEEP is well known to American schoolmasters by his elaborate school edition of the Iliad i-vi, and his useful translation of Autenrieth's Homeric Dictionary. His name is a sufficient guarantee for the accuracy and thoroughness of the scholarship of the present volume. It is strictly a companion for Hadley and Allen, as it professes to be, and follows closely the grammar arrangement in its topics. These are illustrated by numerous exercises and explanations; but constant reference to the grammar is made from the beginning, and the language of the grammar rules is retained as exactly as the connection will allow. From different points of view, we should say the book attempts either too much or too little. It should have been either a complete skeleton, in its Accidence at least, of the grammar, or it should have been confined to exercises and explanations only, with references to the parent work for formal statements of principles. As it is, it suffers in directness and perspicuity from its divided aim, and, worst of all, seems likely to prove very inflexible in use.

The Vocabulary at the end of the book is meagre. The Greek-English part should contain either full statements of peculiarities of inflection in the words, or references to the grammar for them. Space could readily be found for this by omitting the rather aimless "Classified Vocabulary" in the middle of the book. An attempt is made to indicate the quantity of the doubtful vowels; but since it is not carried out consistently, it seems more likely to confuse than to help beginners, besides marring the appearance of the page. The iota subscriptum given to σώζω looks like an affectation, while that of θνῄσκω is really puzzling. We noticed a circumflexed καί on page 146; but generally the book is clearly and handsomely printed, and free from misprints. The stitching is as bad as that of all American school-books seems to be. Nothing short of "breaking the book's back" will make it lie open at a given page. When a book is designed, as this one is, to be used simultaneously with another, this stiffness of back becomes a serious annoyance. The duty of the maker of school-books does not end with the last "revise."
